Rotteck's History, p. 95—"The ancient Pelasgian hordes appear a long time as proper savages. Unsettled, without laws or manners, they wandered about in the woods of Greece, subsisted on acorns and raw flesh, knew not the laws of marriage, and reciprocally destroyed one another."

Did these cannibal Caucasians civilize themselves? My friend says they did; I say they did not. "To history then be the decision referred." Tytler's History, p. 22, says that "Greece was indebted for the first rudiments of civilization to the Egyptians and Phœnicians." We have already shown, by the testimony of Herodotus, Blumenbach, Denan, Hamilton, and other authority equally unquestionable, that the Egyptians were of the Negro race, and thatthe Phœnicians were Canaanites, the illustrious progenitors of the Negro race, according to Lawrence, Bishop Sumner, and others, as quoted by Mrs. Davis. The historian last quoted says farther, "The first dawn of civilization arose in Greece, under the Titians, a colony from Egypt or Phœnicia; this colony gave the Greeks the first ideas of religion." Robbins' History says, "The date of the commencement of the Greeks, as a community, is from the founding of Argos by Inachus from Phœnicia, 1856 B. C., and they were unacquainted with letters till the time of Cadmus the Phœnician, who first introduced the use of letters into Greece." Tytler says, "Cadmus introduced alphabetic writing into Greece from Phœnicia, from which period the Greeks made rapid advances in civilization." Rotteck's History says, "The Greeks did not rise from the state of animal rudeness until new colonies, who brought civilization and wealth with them, immigrated, some from Asia Minor, and some from Egypt and Phœnicia, whose arrival marks an epoch in Greece worthy of the attention of the general historian." Again—"The Phœnician Cadmus came to Bœtia, built Cadmeis, and became a benefactor, by the culture of the soil, by improving the inhabitants of all Greece, and by the communication of the art of writing. Now, for the first time, a firm foundation of civilization was laid." We are informed by the same historian, that Cecrops, an Egyptian Negro, came a few years before Cadmus, and began to civilize the people; still their proper civilization dates from the introduction of letters by Cadmus, one of the accursed Canaanites. We repeat the question, Did these root-digging Greeks civilize themselves? Nay, verily; Japheth ran wild in the woods of Greece, ate ground-nuts, and raw woodchucks, and human flesh, and slept in hollow trees, till Canaan came over and tamed him, learned him to dress himself, to build a fire, to plant and cook, and gave him an alphabet, and learned him to read it. For ages the Greeks ran wild, and made no advancement, till the vibrations from another link in the chain reached them. They in turn vibrated and sent the echo on. That echo shall yet again return to Ethiopia's jungled plains, and yet again shall Greece feel its power. It shall circumnavigate the globe again and again, till every link shall vibrate in unison, and Caucasian and Ethiopian, American and Mongolian, shall shake hands in the millennial morn.

My friend asks, "Who taught the Caucasians to build ships, and to chain the elements?" and says, "They taught themselves." Let history speak. Tytler's History, p. 22, says, "We are indebted to the Phœnicians (Canaanites of Scripture) for the first attempts at commercial navigation." The Canaanites, then, the grandfathers of the Negroes, taught the Caucasians to build ships and navigate them. Robbins' History, p. 39, says, "The Phœnicians are regarded as the earliest navigators, merchants, and workmen of the world." The sails of these Canaanites whitened the Mediterranean, while many Caucasian nations were digging roots and climbing trees. Their artificers polished the gilded walls of Solomon's temple, while many Caucasian nations slept in hollow logs, too rude to construct a better dwelling.

My friend very truly remarks, "It was the invention of letters that particularly showed the divinity of the human mind. It is the perpetuation of his ideas that, above all things else, distinguishes man from the brute. The use of letters is the principle circumstance that distinguishes a civilized people from a herd of savages, incapable of knowledge or reflection." Who invented letters? Who bestowed on the world that great perpetuator of ideas, "without which no people has ever made any considerable progress in the abstract sciences, or possessed in a high state of perfection the useful and agreeable arts of life?" Who "showed the divinity of the human mind" by the invention of letters? "To history be the decision referred." Tytler's History says, "We are indebted to the Canaanites for the invention of writing." Dr. Goode says, "We are indebted to the Phœnicians or Canaanites for the invention of letters, and this opinion is supported by the testimony of Porpbyry, Eusebius, Pliny, Aniutus, Curtius, Lucan, and indeed all the Latin writers." The same author remarks, after an able review of the question, "Such is a brief history of the noblest art ever invented by the unassisted effort of the human understanding—an art that gives stability to thought, and presents in imperishable colors a portraiture of the soul. Without it, hard indeed would be the separation of friends; and the traveler would be an exile from his native home. Without this, what to us would be the wisdom of past ages, and the history of former states? The chain of nature would be broken through all its links. Before its mighty touch, time and space become annihilated; it joins epoch to epoch, and pole to pole. It is the great sun of the moral world, that warms and vivifies, irradiates and develops, the best virtues of the heart, and the best faculties of the intellect. We have here a very significant reply to the inquiry, "Who taught the Caucasian to subject the world to his sway, and gave him an insight into all the wonderful inventions of mighty art?" The despised sons of Canaan taught him. Does the Caucasian owe him no better return than a merciless robbery of his God-given intellect? Can he make him no better return for his early teachings, than to crush out the last struggling energies of that divinity, with which he invented letters, that mighty lever of human improvement?

Passing from this subject back to the subject of slavery, my friend says, "Most sincerely do we respond to the sentiment, 'Let him up.' Nay, more—help him up. He is a man, a brother. Let us be ready at all times to help this outcast by all legitimate means." Good; I am glad my friend has progressed so rapidly in abolition sentiments since this discussion commenced. In the Recorder of Dec. 5th, I find her earnestly urging the duty of obedience to a law which not only forbids us to let the "Ethiopian" up, but commands us, under the severest penalties, to carry him down to the dreadful pit of slavery, after he has helped himself up by his own unaided energies. When my friend then said, "We ought to obey that law," she said we ought not to let him up; for the professed object of that law is to prevent him from getting up. Now she says, "We ought to let him up—yea, help him up." I call this rapid progress in reform, and I trust our correspondence has not been in vain. I hope those "white inhabitants," for whom my friend has vouched, have partaken of the same reform, and feel enough of the "spirit of abolitionism" to "let him up—yea, help him up, by all legitimate means."

My friend says, "We are the citizens of a country where slavery is tolerated, not because it is approved, but because it cannot be avoided." But why, pray, can we not avoid it? Has not England avoided it? Has not France and Portugal; yea, and has not piratical Algiers, avoided it? Have not New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and all the Northern States, avoided it. And cannot the remaining States avoid it? Then shame on their weakness! Poor Caucasians they! We are citizens of a very different country from that of our friend. In our country, slavery is not only tolerated, but is, and has been for more than fifty years, the object of its most special regard—a country whose public archives are filled with speeches and sermons, lauding it to the heavens, and claiming the God of heaven as its special protector, and affirming that "it is the corner-stone of our Republic"—a nation whose statute-books are bursting with the accumulation of enactments to perpetuate slavery, and make it the predominant institution. Slavery, in our country, has no inherent vitality. It is self-corroding, self-consuming, and could not stand a day without the fostering care of some mighty arm. That arm is our national government. It has stood like a watchful physician over a dying patient, and has administered to every demand. The haggard ghost of slavery has been borne to our national halls at every session; our Congress has been turned into a council of physicians; our treasury has been their pill-bags, from which they have extracted pills by the million, to cram down its greedy throat; and still it calls for more, and still more it gets. When dollars cease to satisfy, human life is poured out upon its polluted shrine, as the bones of ten thousand Americans, now bleached and bleaching on the pampas of Florida, and the plains of Mexico, do testify. The country in which we live is so far from enduring slavery as an "unavoidable thing," that it has just passed an act, called the Fugitive Slave Act, commanding good citizens to aid in stopping and carrying back all poor slaves who have peaceably liberated themselves, and are running away to another country. In our country the Chief Ruler has just bared the mighty military arm of the nation, and in a solemn proclamation has commanded all officers, civil and military, in and around Boston, to aid in preventing a poor Negro from getting away, and inflicting punishment on all who might "let him up," or "help him up." There sleep the ashes of Warren, and a host of others, who would be free or die, (if they can sleep.) There stands the monumental pile to tell of other days and other principles. But the chain-crushed spirit flies to it in vain. The bristling bayonets of a mighty nation are pointed at him; he must go to slavery or die. Thus, under the very shadow of that granite altar of freedom, is reared the bloody altar of slavery, smoking with its fresh victims.

Such is the country we live in—not a country in which slavery "cannot be avoided," but in which it can scarcely be sustained, by the utmost stretch of all its civil and military power—a country which has taken slavery, when a dying infant, and forced blood into its veins, and breath into its nostrils, till it has become a dying monster. The moment this forcing pump shall stop, it will become a dead monster. Ours is a country which is accountable for all the woes of slavery; which has nursed it and given it life; and which declares that if slavery must die, it will die with it. Such is the voice which has rung out its hollow tones from our Congress for the last two sessions. Ours is a nation which, when Mexico has "avoided slavery," has forced it back upon the fairest portion of it, and striven with all its energies, to reinstate it in the remaining portion—when California has "avoided it," has striven, as with mortal agonies, to plant it there. Our nation, then, looks very little like that of our friend, in which "slavery is tolerated because it cannot be avoided." We hope to live to see our country a country in which slavery does not exist, because it can find no supporters—no apologists. When these are wanting, we are sure there can be no slavery.

Once more, my friend says, "We have yet to learn that it is our privilege to sit in judgment upon the laws, and make our private opinions the test whether we will obey them or not." . . . "To us it appears necessary that private judgment should be suspended before the decisions of the majority." . . . "From our hearts we respect and venerate the Congress. We must concede our private opinions to the judgment of a body of men like this." We recollect to have read this sentiment frequently before. It has been the watch-word of tyrants in all ages. It has been the central idea of Popes' Bulls, and Emperors' Edicts, time immemorial. This sentiment underlies the iron throne of Russia. It is the text from which Nicholas preaches submission to his twenty million serfs. It has been the rallying cry of the Catholic Church, and to its doleful echo ten thousand martyrs have marched to the burning stake, and ten thousand more to the scaffold and guillotine. To these torturing engines, the damp dungeon has been added, all fit instruments in the hands of tyrants to crush free thought and "private judgment," and drive man's conscience from its empire. Nicholas of Russia must think for his people, and they can only form private opinions, and act according to them, at the expense of their heads. Pope Pius IX. claims the prerogative to manufacture opinions for the millions of his deluded, brutish subjects, and through his legions of Cardinals, Bishops, and Priests, to force them upon them; and this lazy, thoughtless multitude, know no higher law of action than the one my friend has enunciated. They deem it exceedingly unbecoming not to yield their "private opinion to the judgment of a body of men like this." Hence they have never advanced one single step in mental development, and they never will, so long as their "private opinions" are elaborated in the bacchanalian conclaves of a polluted priesthood. 'Tis tyrants only that fear independent thought. Before it Louis Phillippe fled from a throne on which he had grown gray in tyranny. Before its stately march the hoary-headed dynasties of Europe now reel like a drunken man, and even the great opinion-maker of Russia himself looks askance and shakes his mane. When the dauntless student of Erfurth, in the presence of his grinning enemies, consigned the Bull of the Pope to the flames at Worms, that godless despot trembled like an aspen before the majesty of Luther—that man who knew no higher law of action than his own private opinion," of right and wrong, sanctioned by his own conscience. George the Third grew pale with fear when he knew that the colonies had formed their own opinion of his unrighteous laws. It is an adage as old as Republicanism itself, that a Republican Government is based on the virtue and intelligence of the people, and that all laws not resting in the conscience of the people are nullities. If private judgment and conscience are to be surrendered, what becomes of republicanism? It is gone, and despotism takes the reins. Where must every law in our country appeal for its final sanction? I answer, It must come before the tribunal of "private judgment," and obtain its approval, ere it can claim the potency of law. It is the highest prerogative of the people to sit "in judgment upon the laws." But if private judgment is to be laid down at the feet of Congress, and every law is to be pronounced good because "such a body of men" have enacted it, then have we a changeless despotism. How can any progress whatever in national reform be expected, if the people are not to sit in judgment upon their laws? Suppose our present Congress should enact that hereafter every male child in the nation should be put to death. Now, if the private opinion of the people cannot sit in judgment upon it, it is a Medo-Persian statute, changeless forever. God never imposed a higher duty upon a people, than to sit in judgment upon such a law. That citizen who refuses to scan the laws of his country, and subject them to the test of private opinion and conscience, is reckless to his country and his God, and deserves only that slavery which such recklessness must produce.

Slavery, in our country to-day, rests upon this very principle which my friend has set forth. The slave is shut up in the deepest ignorance—every aveune to knowledge is closed. And why? That he may not be capable of effective thought; for well do tyrants know, that strong thoughts beget strong actions. We are informed that we should "entreat them as fathers, or keep silence before their superior dignity and wisdom;" but upon what, I ask, can we predicate our petition, if we are not to subject their acts to the test of private opinion first? What man could consistently petition for a repeal of the late Fugitive Act, if he had not set in judgment upon it, and pronounced it wrong, first? The very act of petition implies prejudgment upon the thing mentioned in the petition. And must we lay our conscience down, too, at the feet of "superior dignity and wisdom?" It may be true, that "conscience cannot be considered a certain arbiter of right and wrong;" but it is the best we have, and I am sure of this, that my conscience is a better guide for me, than the conscience of any other man, be he even one of the Congress. I am sure of another thing, and that is, that every act of mine must be predicated upon my own "private judgment" of its conformity to right or wrong.

If a human law, in my own "private judgment," conflicts with divine law, I can have no plainer duty than to disobey it, and suffer peaceably its penalty. I know I have not the same company that my friend boasts of. "Congress" is against me; the President is aginst me; Daniel Webster is against me. But yet I am not quite alone. All the holy martyrs died because, in their own "private judgment," they believed they ought not to obey certain human laws. If I mistake not, there was a Daniel long ago, and he too was the king's chief counsellor. But the king made a wicked law, without his knowledge. Daniel forthwith set in judgment upon that law, and by carefully consulting his "private judgment," his own conscience, and his God, he concluded he would not obey it. The three worthies did not think best to lay down their "private judgment" at the feet of "superior dignity and wisdom." Even the midwives of Egypt disobeyed "superior wisdom," and were blessed for it. Christ and the Apostles were of the class who thought, "We ought to obey God rather than man." I have no reluctance, then, in leaving my friend to enjoy the society of "Congress and the President."

Finally, "If there is a prejudice of which our nature is susceptible, it is in favor of our government and its officials." I propose to modify this sentiment a little, and adopt it. If there is a prejudice of which our nature is susceptible, it is in favor of impartial justice, and human freedom; and if we have any earnest prayer, it is, that our government and its officials may speedily become the exponents of these principles. Then will we honor them, and then obey them.

RAIN ON THE ROOF.

BY COATES KINNEY.

When the humid shadows hover
Over all the starry spheres,
And the melancholy darkness
Gently weeps in rainy tears,
'T is a joy to press the pillow
Of a cottage chamber bed,
And to listen to the patter
Of the soft rain overhead.

Every tinkle on the shingles
Has an echo in the heart,
And a thousand dreamy fancies
Into busy being start,
And a thousand recollections
Weave their bright hues into woof,
As I listen to the patter
Of the soft rain on the roof.
There in fancy comes my mother,
As she used to, years agone,
To survey her darling sleepers
Ere she left them till the dawn,
I can see her bending o'er me,
As I list to the refrain
Which is played upon the shingles
By the patter of the rain.

Then my little seraph sister,
With her wings and waving hair,
And her bright eyed cherub brother,
A serene, angelic pair,
Glide around my wakeful pillow,
With their praise or mild reproof,
As I listen to the murmur
Of the soft rain on the roof.

And another comes to thrill me
With her eyes' delicious blue,
And forget I, gazing on her,
That her heart was all untrue;
I remember but to love her
With a rapture kin to pain,
And my heart's quick pulses vibrate
To the patter of the rain.

There is nought in Art's bravuras
That can work with such a spell
In the spirit's pure, deep fountains,
Whence the holy passions well,
As that melody of Nature,
That subdued, subduing strain
Which is played upon the shingles
By the patter of the rain.

FAITH AND SORROW.

The examples of resignation, faith and love, which converts from paganism have from time to time given, stand forth as so many striking proofs of the power of the Gospel. The following sketch of "sorrow, resignation and faith," is from the journal of Mr. Benjamin, in the February number of the Missionary Magazine:—

"Arrived at Themboung, landing about 3 o'clock P. M. While dinner was preparing, I went with my teacher a half hour's walk along a path almost hidden by the jungle, brushing upon my clothes as I passed, the drops of recent rain from the grass and leaves. The little village of four or five houses clustered around the zayat, does not present an unpleasant appearance. I found the assistant seated on the verandah of his house; and his wife, who had been some time ill, soon came out. I then broke to them the tidings of the death of their daughter—the wife of a Karen disciple, who has been in my employ for two or three months past. It was received with submission by both parents. The mother, after expressing her entire willingness that God should do as he chooses with her and her children, sat down on the floor, buried her face in her hands, and wept. 'I am sorrowful, teacher,' said she. 'I had expected my daughter to come home and stay with me. But God has called her and I consent. There is left at home with me only a poor idiot child, who has never known enough to recognize any one, or move out of its place, and I am sick and unable to work. These afflictions seem heavy, but I know they will not last long; and are nothing compared with the joy I shall have in heaven.' I then referred to a son, a bright and promising lad of about fourteen years of age, who has been studying with me for a few weeks past, and recites to Mrs. B. in my absence. She immediately said she wished him to stay with me the year round, and work for me and study with me, and become a well trained preacher if God should so order it. This permission was what I desired, but what, under the circumstances, I hardly expected. This poor woman's unquestioning faith, combined with a full share of maternal tenderness, deeply affected me. Blessed Saviour! who hast sought out and polished such a gem in such a wilderness!"

EVIL INCLINATIONS.

A gentleman was once praising the virtue of honesty; what a dignity it imparted to our nature; how it recommended us to the Supreme Being. He confirmed all by a celebrated line from Pope,

> "An honest man's the noblest work of God."

"Sir," replied one, "however excellent the virtue of honesty may be, I fear there are very few men in the world that really possess it."

"You surprise me," said the stranger.

"Ignorant as I am of your character, sir, I fancy it would be no difficult matter to prove even you a dishonest man."

"I defy you."

"Will you give me leave then to ask you a question or two, and promise not to be offended?"

"Ask your question and welcome."

"Have you never met with an opportunity of getting gain by unfair means?" The gentleman paused. "I don't ask whether you made use of, but whether you have met with such opportunity? I for my part I have, and I believe every body else has."

"Very probable I may."

"How did you feel your mind affected on such an occasion?" Had you no secret desire, not the least inclination to seize the advantage which offered? Tell me without any evasion, and consistently with the character you admire."

"I must acknowledge, I have not always been absolutely free from every irregular inclination; but—"

"Hold, sir, none of your salvos, you have confessed enough. If you had the desire, though you never proceeded, this shows you were dishonest in heart. That is what the Scriptures call concupiscence. It defiles the soul. It is a breach of that law which requireth truth in the inward parts; and unless you are pardoned by the blood of Christ, it will be a just ground of your condemnation when God shall judge the secrets of men."

THE TWO TRAVELERS.

Two travelers once rested on their journey at an inn, when suddenly a cry arose that there was a fire in the village. One of the travelers immediately sprang up and ran to offer his assistance. But the other strove to detain him, saying, "Why should you waste your time? Are there not hands enough to assist? Why concern ourselves about strangers?" His friend, however, listened not to his remonstrances, but hastened to the fire, the other following and looking on at a distance. A woman rushed out of the burning house, crying, "My children! my children!" When the stranger heard this, he darted into the house among the burning timbers, whilst the flames raged fiercely around him. "He will surely perish!" cried the spectators. But after a short time, behold, he came forth with scorched hair, carrying two young children in his arms, and delivered them to their mother. She embraced the infants, and fell at the stranger's feet, but he lifted her up and comforted her. The house soon fell with a terrible crash.

As the stranger and his companion returned to the inn, the latter said, "Who bade thee risk thy life in such a dangerous attempt?"

"He," answered the first, "who bids me put the seed into ground, that it may decay and bring forth the new fruit."

"But if thou hadst been buried among the ruins?"

His companion smiled and said, "Then should I myself have been the seed!"

STOP AND MEND THE BUCKLE.

You have read in our own history of that hero, who, when an overwhelming force was in full pursuit, and all his followers were urging him to more rapid flight, coolly dismounted in order to repair a flaw in his horse's harness. Whilst busied with the broken buckle, the distant cloud swept down in nearer thunders, but just as the prancing hoofs and eager spears were ready to dash down on him, the flaw was mended, the clasp was fastened, the steed was mounted, and like a swooping falcon, he had vanished from their view. The broken buckle would have left him on the field, a dismounted and inglorious prisoner. The timely delay sent him in safety back to his huzzaing comrades.

There is in daily life the same luckless precipitancy and the same profitable delay. The man who, from his prayerless waking, bounces off into the business of the day, however good his talents or great his diligence, is only galloping on a steed harnessed with a broken buckle, and must not marvel if, in his hottest haste, or most hazardous leap, he be left inglorious in the dust; and though it may occasion some little delay before-hand, his neighbor is wise who sets all in order before the march begins.

FALLING FLAT ON THE PROMISES.—A negro in Virginia, who was remarkable for his good sense and his knowledge of the essential truths of Christianity and especially for his freedom from all gloomy fears in regard to his eternal state, was once addressed on this wise: "You seem to be always comfortable in the hope of the Gospel. I wish you would tell me how you manage it, to keep so steadily in this blessed frame of mind." "Why, massa," he replied, "I just fall flat on the promises and I pray right up," an answer that would do honor to the head and heart of a philosopher, and that contains in it the true secret of happiness.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 3, 1851.

JENNY LIND AND THE SUNDAY.

The fact that Jenny Lind declined to leave New Orleans on Sunday, notwithstanding it was the only arrangement by which she could meet a previous engagement to sing at Natchez on Monday evening, is heralded by some of the presses of the country as one of the many excellent traits which adorn her character, "if not, indeed, under the circumstances of the case, the crowning act of her religious life." The New Orleans Crescent views it as "a practical fact—equal to fifty sermons," and is particularly careful to state, that she "declined to hold any conversation in regard to the pecuniary loss." It seems that arrangements had been made for her concerts at Natchez and Memphis, based on her departure from New Orleans on Saturday; but, from some cause or other, the boat was delayed. There was yet time to keep the appointment, and leave on Sunday morning, which she promptly refused to do. The boat, therefore, remained till Monday, and the concert at Natchez was deferred.

On the whole, we are rather gratified that Jenny acted as she did in the case; not that we have the least sympathy with that theology which teaches the sanctity of the first day of the week, but because she evinced some regard to religious principle in keeping holy the only day which she knows anything about as the Sabbath of the Lord. We say this on the supposition, that she is in the same condition with thousands of others, whose minds are in deep darkness with regard to the true import of the fourth commandment. Were she better instructed, she would probably manifest quite as much decision in keeping the only true Sabbath. But whether the papers which now herald her praise would, in that case, be as forward to do so, is at least questionable.

As to any pecuniary sacrifice incurred by her refusal to sail on Sunday, the idea is simply ridiculous. Jenny is far from being non compos mentis, if a tithe of the reports concerning her can be credited. She was too sagacious not to see, that her deference to the common prejudice in regard to Sunday would increase her popularity with the religious portion of community; and she knew well enough, that such a world-wide reputation as she possesses would secure her a full audience, at any time, and in any place, though there might have been half a dozen disappointments before. Not one picayune did she lose by the transaction, and we question very much whether it was not a profitable speculation.

The great good which the Crescent hopes will result from this example of Miss Lind, will, in all probability, never be realized. We would say the same, even though her example had been given in favor of our own peculiar views. We have very little faith in the influence of great names to carry forward the cause of God. Were the Swedish Nightingale to become, from this time forward, a true Bible Sabbath keeper, we doubt very much whether there would be, in consequence of it, half a dozen converts to our faith. If the influence of God's own example of resting on the seventh day, joined with his positive command to keep it holy, is so little, can we expect that the influence of a frail, sinful mortal, however distinguished, will be any thing? As men are not willing to be influenced by His example, it is not likely that he will allow them to be influenced by persons of distinction, lest the glory should redound to the creature rather than to himself. In accordance with this principle, "not many wise men, not many mighty, not many noble, are called" to the work of preaching the gospel. From the beginning, the public advocates of Christianity have been chosen from the humbler walks of life; for it must be made manifest, that the excellency of the power is of God, and not of men. Their distinguished position in life, their family influence, their worldly reputation, have very little to do in rendering the cause of God prosperous. It is "not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." And we wish that Christians would manifest less anxiety about securing the influence of great names than they do. Yet there is not a denomination in the land that does not cherish a sort of pride, if it can number among its adherents some of the eminent of the earth. What wonder is it, therefore, that the advocates of Sunday observance are proud to reckon the Northern Nightingale as belonging to their school?

We should not be surprised, however, if the example of Miss Lind should do something towards rendering the more strict observance of Sunday fashionable. She has done considerable in setting the fashions of the country. We have Jenny Lind head-dresses, and Jenny Lind shawls, and Jenny Lind gloves, and the ladies, we believe, have a mode of doing up their hair a la Jenny Lind. Indeed, there has been quite a mania for this sort of procedure. It will have its day, and then change, as other fashions have done. So of Jenny Lind Sunday observance. It may prove quite fashionable in certain quarters for a time, but, being founded on no religious principle, it is but a Jenny Lind observance after all. Certain modes and forms of religion were very fashionable in our Savior's day, simply because the rulers, Pharisees, and other great men of the nation, led the way in them. But the people were a set of hypocrites in the sight of God notwthstanding. We would take the liberty of suggesting to our friends of the popular faith, that if they would produce one solitary passage from the word of God which teaches, either expressly or by implication, that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, they would do more towards promoting its strict observance, than they can by securing the example of ten thousand Jenny Linds in its favor.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 32.

GLASGOW, March 14th, 1851.

It is expected that some resistance will be made at Oxford University to the Government Commission of Inquiry, as there can be little doubt that there is need of improvement, and as little doubt that those who may be profiting by abuses will be unwilling that such abuses should be exposed. A Fellowship, in any one of the Colleges, not only gives to the holder a share in its government, but entitles him also to a share of its revenue—whether that Fellowship belonged to the original foundation, or was afterward engrafted, by a future benefactor, upon a College already established. The Senior Fellowships are the most lucrative; but they all confer a right to apartments in the College. Some few of them may be held by laymen. All Fellowships cease when the holders marry. The advantages of Scholars vary in different Colleges. Their connection with the foundation is not so intimate as that of the Fellowships; but, in some Colleges, the Scholars succeed to Fellowships in rotation. The emolument varies from £100 or £80, to £20 or less per annum, with some advantages as to board. That these endowments, as giving opportunity for persevering, continued study, have contributed much to the promotion of learning, it were vain to deny; and, under proper regulations, similar advantages, given to those disposed and qualified to examine fully questions bearing on the welfare of the church, it may be believed, could be made subservient to true religion. But, unless under the guidance of sound principle, this learned leisure may, of course, as in Oxford seems to have been the case, be used to the disadvantage of truth. The same remark applies to the Advowsons held by the University. An advowson is the right of presenting a qualified person, in the Church's sense of qualification, to a Bishop, to be instituted into a vacant benefice. There are 11,342 benefices in England and Wales, of which the Crown has the patronage or advowsons of 1,048; the Bishops of 1,301; there are in the hands of private persons, (including laymen, and even Roman Catholics,) 6,619; and, as already noticed, 450 belong to the Colleges of Oxford.

In the year 1110, four ecclesiastics were sent to Cambridge to teach the sciences. They commenced in a barn—which was, however, soon found to be too small for the number of the students seeking to profit thereby. The history of this University can be traced downward from that period till the present time, when it has numerous Colleges—there being here no distinction between the Colleges and Halls, as at Oxford. The revenue of the University is under £5,000 a year; the fees add about £2,000 more. But some of its Colleges have large revenues—that of King's College about £20,000 a year. The aggregate value of the Fellowships is reckoned at about £90,000 a year. The revenue derived from ordinary students, for tuition, rent, and other payments, is computed to be at least £47,000 a year. The church patronage of all the Colleges of Cambridge, exceeds 300 advowsons.

The University of Dublin has but a single College, and is of later date—having been incorporated in 1591, by Queen Elizabeth. The income from landed estates is nearly £14,000, and from other estates, £2,400 a year. From Class Fees, the income is stated at £30,000, besides considerable receipts from rents of chambers, and other fees. The constitution of the Dublin University is less complicated than those of Oxford and Cambridge.

The English Universities are of a less popular character than they were before the Reformation. The Universities themselves are public lay corporations; the Colleges incorporated with them are charitable foundations, the creation of pious and benevolent persons. These Colleges owe only a nominal allegiance to the University; but admission to University rights and privileges is confined to such as have been previously members of one of the Colleges or Halls. It is this which has prevented the subscription to the Articles and Doctrines of the Church of England from being repealed. As dissent has extended in England, this has occasioned great dissatisfaction, which will probably increase until such restrictions are wholly withdrawn. This is one of the points to which the Commission is expected to extend its inquiry—as it is also a reason for the Oxford jealousy of the Commission.

Lord Melgund has postponed his motion on the Scottish Education Bill, in the House of Commons, till the 9th of next month; and Lord John Russell's Jewish Disabilities' Bill, which he was to have introduced last night, has been postponed indefinitely, by the House having been counted out—there not having been 40 members present at 4 o'clock.

There has been cast 41,000 lbs. new type for printing the London Exhibition Catalogue—being a weight sufficient to set up 48 Times newspapers. The painting of the building is nearly finished, and the goods nearly all forward designed for exhibition.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 4.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

Leaving Chinandega—A Native Saddle—The Guide—Chichigalpa—Leon—Civil War—The Inn—Imposition by Americans—Lake Managua—Beautiful Scenery—Arrival at Metearis.

The sun was just rising over the Viejo Volcano, when our party, now amounting to sixteen, were in the saddle, ready to start. But, instead of the good dragoon saddle that I had used the day before, I was mounted on one of native construction, of raw hide, stretched on a frame, made long for the purpose of carrying double, and admirably fitted to gall the poor animals between which it was interposed. There was about as much resemblance between this and the old one as there is between the "saw-horse" used by carpenters and a boy's hobby-horse. The saddle taken from me was no doubt sent back to decoy some one else into the snare. However, I was determined not to suffer my zest for a pleasant journey to be destroyed by impositions, to which I had become so accustomed. A copious shower had fallen the night before, filling all the hollows in the road with water, but it brightened the green leaves, and revived the odors from innumerable flowers. The road was similar to that we had traveled the day before; though the trees grew larger, and one variety was conspicuous from its dark glossy leaf, interspersed with small white flowers, and its branches often united over our heads. The inhabitants of the country are collected in towns. I saw no dwellings by the way, or break in the forest; and we pushed on in a disorderly squad, along the cart road, which had never known an age of internal improvement. No one ever stops to fill a rut or remove a tree fallen across the road, but a new track is made around it. Our guide was a Creole, dressed in white roundabout and pants, with a dragoon's sword and pistols. He was an ill-natured fellow, and would ride on at a slow pace, with his hands resting on his hips, in dogged silence, except when some one of the party attempted to pass him; then he would call out "poco tiempo," which, in the language of the country, conveys the general idea of procrastination, and is in more general use than any phrase. One hears it at all hours in the day, whatever the occasion, or however urgent the need. I have thought it would be an appropriate motto on the armorials of the State. Our own party was dressed in every variety of costume seen in California, and armed with various weapons, among which the heavy Missourian rifle was conspicuous; and as we rode irregularly along the narrow winding way, overarched with gigantic trees, enlivened by flocks of parrots and scarlet macaws, we might have been taken for a party of outlaws of the seventeenth century. To heighten the romance of the scene, companies of women were stationed at long intervals, with fruit and chicha, a poor kind of lemonade, where we dismounted to refresh ourselves, and recover from the fatigue of riding.

We had traveled six leagues when we arrived at Chichigalpa, resembling the last town in size and general appearance, but more neat, and the Cactus fences more general and regular. We did not stop here, but rode on to Josoltega, two leagues farther, where we took dinner; and about three P. M. the spires and turrets of numerous churches appeared over the crest of an opposite hill. The guide pointed to it, and said "Leon." The road here led down a considerable ravine, with a noisy stream flowing through it. It was about four o'clock when our dusty cavalcade filed through the silent streets of the great emporium of Nicaragua, and stopped at the house of a native.

Leon looks like a very old town, and was built of substantial masonry. The houses are mostly one story, but neat after the Spanish style, and some of the public buildings are superior to any we saw in the country. Under the Spanish rule, this city was populous and wealthy, but now it is ruinous and desolate. The ravages of civil war meet your eye at every step, as fresh as though they were the work of yesterday, and there seems to be no disposition to repair the waste. The Cathedral is still a magnificent structure on the great Plaza, but even this is speckled with gun shots, and the plastered walls in the interior of the tower, opposite the windows, are badly defaced from the same cause. The buildings in the immediate neighborhood were destroyed, and the ruins are still undisturbed. Those exposed to the fire from the Cathedral reminded me of a board fence which had been long used as a target for fowling pieces, and even the window sashes are broken by musket balls. The houses on streets enfiladed by the artillery stationed in the plaza, show deep furrows in their walls, plowed by the heavy shot, and even the iron balustrade to the windows of our hotel, through which a shot had passed, has the broken ends of the iron rods still projecting outwards as the ball left them. I could hardly believe that these were the effects of the revolutionary struggle, which made all the Spanish colonies free nearly forty years ago. The scene produced with me a feeling of melancholy. There did not appear to be a want of inhabitants, but it seemed that Civilization had been blasted in the bud—that she had expired in the convulsion that gave birth to Freedom. The evidences of the sanguinary war of the revolution, and their success afterward in maintaining their independence, when the Mexican States, aided by the Guatemalian forces, sought to compel the other States of Central America to join their confederation, and the successful resistance made to the Buccaneers, who were seldom foiled, by the city of Leon, prove the people to be not wanting in courage; but their geographical position has made them more and more obscure, as other States were more accessible to commerce; and though they possessed a country unsurpassed for climate, beauty, and fertility, there was no market for their productions, while it required but little to supply their wants. The energies of the people were thus paralyzed.

The inn at which we had stopped contained a long range of rooms used for sleeping apartments, with massive wall and brick floors, with only one window in each, revealing the smoky walls and rafters, hung with tapestry woven by spiders, and breaking away under the accumulation of dust. The only furniture in these rooms consisted of narrow bedsteads, covered with raw hide, and on these, without even the luxury of a pillow, you were expected to make peace with Morpheus. A portico extended around the court, where the table was spread. In the evening a train of caritas arrived, which filled our inn to overflowing, and attracted a curious crowd of natives to the door. While seated on the steps, a group of boys gathered about me, asking questions, in a very friendly way, about our schools and boys, and attempted to show off their acquirements by repeating a variety of English phrases, and the conjugation of Latin verbs. They spoke highly of their schools, and gave me the impression that they were very good boys. I asked one of them if he would go with me to North America. After some hesitation, he said he thought his father would not allow him to do so, but ran off, and returned soon after with a little naked fellow, about five years old, who, he said, would go, having no father or mother, or other encumbrance. One of the boys was blind in one eye, and wished me to restore it, and his father would give me much plata. As I declined this offer also, he then led up a poor and infirm old woman as a subject for charity, when they gave me their "adios," and I went out to find a hammock unoccupied. The blind boy volunteered to guide me to another hotel. The streets are narrow, and lighted only by a candle like a pipe-stem burning in a tin lantern over each door, and but for my little guide I would certainly have been bewildered. Passing the plaza, I heard a shouting behind me, repeated several times, when the boy told me I must answer, or he would shoot me. Not knowing the source of my danger, I called out, in "Americano," "What is wanted?" This was satisfactory, perfectly, and I heard the ring of his musket, as he told me to pass on, which I had not ceased to do as fast as possible. After wandering about nearly an hour, we came to an inn, with the American flag over the door, where I engaged a hammock, and hung myself up for the night. There was to have been a fandango at this house, but the ladies would not appear, much to their credit, where Californians were expected. The gentlemen were having the fun all by themselves, and I fell asleep to the music of the banjo and guitar.

We left Leon about eight o'clock the next morning. The road this day was more hilly, and for a considerable distance from the city the country bore evidence of having been formerly under cultivation, but now is covered with a thick growth of weeds. A ride of a mile brought us again into the forest, and we traveled in the shade almost the whole distance to the town of Puebla Nuava, eight leagues from Leon. This is a small and indifferent place. We found a very meager dinner, and continued our journey to Nagarote, four leagues father, where we stopped for the night at the house of an American. Here we met with the shabbiest treatment we had yet experienced. He had hired the portico, with one room, and the privilege of the yard, for $20 00 a month, a native cook for a trifle, and in a country where provisions are cheap he had the impudence to charge the highest rates that are asked in any of our Atlantic cities. The room was small, and furnished with narrow bedsteads, like those of Leon, and he expected two persons to occupy each of these, and then one half of our company were compelled to take lodgings on the brick floor of the portico, for which he required half price. To satisfy us for a bad supper, we were promised a good breakfast, and we made our arrangements to start by break of day on our journey. There was great confusion among the fowls roosting in the orange trees that evening, and we heard notes of formidable preparation; and under this pleasing illusion, we slept well. It was said that the cocks continued to crow all night, and they were certainly in full chorus as we were roused to breakfast. One solitary chanticleer graced the table for twenty men, and he was so tough that he might have ruled the roost in the time of the Spanish viceroyalty; but, with eggs, frizoles and chocolate, we made out to appease the cravings of hunger. The apology this time was, that he had not time to prepare more for so early a start. When ready to leave, we were told that we were expected to pay for the keeping of the horses, which was contrary to our stipulations. We then made up our minds to patronize no more American houses, and told the guide that if he did not feed the horses at his own expense, they might go without food, and set out with a general denunciation upon imposition in general.

It was near sunrise when we were again in the saddle. We had pursued our way through the forest down a gradual descent about three miles, when a broad sheet of water opened before us, known as Lake Managua, or the Lake of Leon. The road lay along its shores for several miles, so close that the dash of its waves wet our horses' feet. I was so captivated by the wild beauty of the scene, that I reined up my horse, and allowed the cavalcade to pass on. A rocky cliff, fifty feet high, lay parallel to the shore, and in the deep shade of trees. Troops of red monkeys were swaying themselves from tree to tree, catching at a distant limb, now with the hand or foot, and now with the tail. Parrots flew from all parts, as though they meditated an attack upon our rear guard, though they kept at a respectful distance, and only made a great outcry. Along the shore were great numbers of water fowl, from the white pelican to the snipe, both waders and divers, so unaccustomed to attacks from men that one would nearly ride over them before they would fly. I dismounted to look for shells, but there seemed to be but few. At length the road led up the hillside, and so charming was the scenery that I could have lingered along it for weeks with pleasure. Suddenly, while still enjoying the deep shade of forest trees, we found ourselves in the midst of the town of Metearis, but not so suddenly that our arrival was not prepared for by the natives; for, as soon as we had dismounted, we were surrounded by venders of fruit, chicha, and whatever they thought they could sell to travelers. Here was a little naked lad, with a large calabash full of oranges, holding them up; he says, "Comprar todos per media?"—buy all for sixpence? And here a little girl, half naked, with a calabash full of cigars, and a look of good-natured innocence, mingled with a smack of coquetry; she says, "Comprar?" Her lip pouts, and she looks disappointed, when you say, "no caro," and she withdraws reluctantly, as if she expected you to change your mind soon.

THE SHANGHAI CHAPEL.

The Agent appointed by the Missionary Board to collect funds for building a missionary chapel in Shanghai, is happy in being able to submit the subjoined report of his collections, from which it will be seen, that there has been obtained for this purpose the sum of three thousand six hundred and twenty-nine dollars. FUNERAL OF MAJ. NOAH.—The mortal remains of Mordecai Manasseh Noah were on Monday of last week removed from his dwelling to the Hebrew burial-ground, attended by the Hebrew Benevolent Society in full regalia, and a large concourse of sympathizing friends. Entering the burial-ground in procession, the concourse nearly filled it. The coffin was set down; the assemblage induced to recede a few feet from each side of the hearse, when a sub procession of some fifteen or twenty Hebrews, (mainly elderly men,) headed by Rev. Mr. Lyon, followed by Rev. Mr. Raphall, and perhaps one other priest, was formed, which marched seven times slowly and measuredly around the body, chanting (in Hebrew) a hymn of invocation to the Almighty for mercy and bliss to the departed soul. At last the liquid notes of the children of Abraham, imploring in the language of the ancient Patriarchs the mercy of God for their departed brother in blood and faith, were heard no more; the chanters dissolved their procession, and mingled with the crowd around them; and now Rev. Dr. Raphall stepped forth and delivered a chaste, eloquent, and felicitous eulogy on him whose dust they were about to consign to earth, tracing the whole course of his history, dwelling happily on the rare kindness of his nature, as evinced in a life-long career of charity, but especially while he was Sheriff of the City, when, on the breaking out of the yellow fever, in 1832, he liberated all the prisoners for debt then in custody, and thus assumed their debts, many of which he was compelled to pay. Dr. Raphall affirmed that Maj. Noah lived and died a steadfast adherent to the Hebrew faith.

BOOKS FOR THE NORWEGIANS.—An old copy of the "Pilgrim's Progress," in Norwegian, has been procured by Rev. Paul Anderson of Chicago. He has compared it with the original, with a view to ascertain the faithfulness of the translation, and is about to furnish it to the American Tract Society for publication, it having been long out of print. He has also a copy of "Doddridge's Rise and Progress," which is to undergo the same process. Two of Baxter's works have already found their way into Norwegian among the Tract Society's publications. Thus the Norwegian people will soon be furnished with literature of the greatest value and in the surest and cheapest manner. There are now two colporteurs among them in Wisconsin, and one Bible agent in Illinois, and five or six young men are in a course of study, with a view to the ministry with these people.

COLLEGIATE EDUCATION AT THE WEST.—The Seventh Annual Report of the Society for the Promotion of Collegiate and Theological Education at the West, contains numerous interesting and encouraging statements respecting the institutions under its patronage. Appropriations for the ensuing year have been made to Marietta, Wabash, Illinois, Knox, Beloit, and Wittenburg Colleges. The application from Marysville College was referred to the Consulting Committee of the Board, and that from the "German Evangelical Synod of the West," was referred to a Special Committee. The receipts for the past year were $17,623 31.

BAPTISTS IN VERMONT.—From the Report of the Vermont Baptist Convention, it appears that the whole number of members in the Baptist churches in Vermont is 6,964; number of churches, 104; number of pastors, 71; number baptized the past year, 310. The contributions to benevolent objects were as follows: To the American and Foreign Bible Society, $137 13; to the Free Mission Society, $85; to the American Baptist Missionary Union, $726 13; to the American Baptist Home Mission Society, $265 98; to the Vermont Convention for Missions within the State, $956 80. Total, $2,491 04.

JUDGE MCLEAN ON UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAWS.—Hon. Judge McLean, of Ohio, in a letter, which has been recently published, makes the following important remark with regard to unconstitutional laws, which is particulary applicable to the Fugitive Slave Law:—

"An unconstitutional act of Congress imposes no obligation on a State, or the people of a State, and may be resisted by an individual or a community. No one, I believe, will controvert this."

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.—We learn that Bro. Gurdon Evans has resigned the Principalship of DeRuyter Institute, and that the place has been filled by the appointment of Bro. James R. Irish. DeRuyter is now, we are told, better accommodated with mail facilities than most country villages, being the terminus of five mail routes, three daily, and two tri-weekly. Of the daily mail routes, one runs to Chittenango, another to Syracuse, and the third to Binghamton.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for April has as great a variety of readable matter as can well be put into 144 pages. In illustrations it is unusually rich. There is a portrait of Washington Irving, and View of his Residence; ditto of William Cullen Bryant; a View of the Great Exhibition Building; four illustrations of the Arctic Regions; three Leaves from Punch, with seven illustrations; and four illustrations of the Fashions.

THE ILLUSTRATED DOMESTIC BIBLE, published by Samuel Hueston, 139 Nassau-st., has reached its 19th number, leaving 5 numbers to complete the series. The illustrations, with the notes by Rev. Ingram Cobbins, will render this a very desirable copy of the Sacred Text.

THE LITERARY ECHO is the title of a seven-by-nine weekly which G. H. Babcock proposes to publish at Westerly, R. I. In the specimen number, now before us, the editor says that he "commences the paper on somewhat of a small scale, but in hopes of being able to enlarge it before the end of the year." May his highest hopes be realized.

Geo. Thompson at Syracuse.

The following extract from a speech delivered by Geo. Thompson at Syracuse, N. Y., is a very timely and effectual answer to the numerous newspaper denunciations of him as a British aristocrat and emissary:—

"For twenty-five years I have devoted my energies to the human race. Instead of being a hireling, I have labored for nothing, and have never received for my labors any thing to make me richer than I was when I entered the list to do battle for human rights. This day, God bear me witness, with the wife of my bosom and five little ones, I am as poor as when, a young man, I issued from my father's house, without wealth or rank, to take my place upon the active stage of life. Yet when, denying myself the companionship of those I love, I come to this land to speak for the common cause of men, the rights of life and liberty, dastard editors and hireling scribblers, who can only, like serpents, be traced by the slime they leave, blacken me without stint or measure, and creep away to their dark rooms, and concoct lies and foul slanders upon an innocent man.

But I am "a foreigner!" O, that is it, indeed—a foreigner. So are your missionaries, in the lands where you have sent them. In all that makes a man a true American, I am an American; for to be a true American is not simply to have been born here. Is it American to hate tyranny and battle against all oppression? Then I am one, for my life has been devoted to this service. Is it American to wish well to your country, and that she should be more and never less free than now? Then I am an American. Is it American to subscribe to the doctrine of the perfect equality of the human race? Then I am an American. Is it American to preach against the union of Church and State? Then I am an American, for I have preached that doctrine to the mitered bishop and proud priest, beneath the ivy-mounted walls of old cathedrals! Is it American to prefer the poor man to the rich—the fustian to the broadcloth? Then I am an American, for I came from the people! I have labored for the people, and, living or dying, I am the friend of the people! Have I attacked the franchise? No! I plead in my own country for its extension to all. The right of trial by jury? Never! I claim it as the right of all, not excepting, by any means, the slave. Have I attacked any truly American institution—any thing of which Washington, Jefferson, or Franklin, approved? No! you know I have not. It is because I advocate the right of all men to freedom, that the slave-holding tyrants of the North and South must hunt me down! To me it is, after all, of little moment what is said; but to you it is of vast moment. Keep still, endorse these papers, and screen these editors from the scorn and contempt they deserve at your hands—let the monster mob set upon me and my friends, and le thim tear me in pieces, let him taste blood, and he will turn in good time and glut himself upon YOU!"

One Week Later from Europe.

By the steamer Canada, which arrived at Boston on Sixth-day last, we have one week later dates from Europe.

From England, we learn that the government of Lord John Russell is still very weak. He cannot get his friends to rally around him, and it is now fully anticipated that there will soon be a dissolution of Parliament, and a general election. On Tuesday evening, in the House of Commons, he sustained another defeat upon the question of Woods and Forests. Lord Duncan moved a resolution demanding a reform in their management. This the government strenuously resisted. On a division there appeared for the proposed reform 120, for Ministers 119.

The agitation on the part of the Catholics of both England and Ireland, against the proposed penal measures of Lord John Russell, continued unabated.

The process of receiving and arranging the articles to be exhibited in the Crystal Palace is going on very satisfactorily, and no doubt is entertained but that the building will be opened at the proposed time in the month of May.

A large body of Hungarians and Poles, refugees from the late struggle in Hungary, had arrived in Liverpool for America; but on their arrival from Turkey at Liverpool, they were met by a deputation from the London Democratic Committee, who have induced them to remain in England, in order, as they say, to be at hand in case their aid should be required to assist the Democratic cause in either France or Hungary.

In France, it is now said that all hopes of a fusion between the two branches of the Bourbon family is at an end. The young Princes at Claremont have written to that effect to the Orleanist Committee at Paris.

There are rumors of various conspiracies, as proposed and threatened in Italy, but nothing positive.

PROTESTANT WORSHIP AT ROME.—Rev. G. H. Hastings, American Chaplain at Rome, in a letter to the Courier and Enquirer, contradicts the statement which represented the Pope as having suppressed Protestant Worship in the Eternal City. The story originated in the London Daily News. The following is an extract from that letter:—

I beg you will allow me to say through your columns, that Mr. Cass never received such a communication as that writer describes, "to the effect that his Holiness had been reluctantly obliged to withdraw the permission which he had granted with respect to the American Protestant Chapel;" that the worship of the American Chapel has not been suspended by the Papal authorities; that we have no reason to suppose it will be; that the stated services of the Sabbath go on as quietly and free from annoyances of any kind whatsoever, as if held in the United States; that there is but one sentiment among the Americans in Rome upon this subject, viz. that the Papal Government has acted handsomely towards us in the toleration of our Protestant Chapel within the walls; and that we are bound to see that it has the credit for it. The publicity given to the false report alluded to, has been a source of much annoyance and regret to us.

Very respectfully yours,
G. H. HASTINGS,
American Chaplain at Rome.

TROUBLE AMONG GAMBLERS AND THEIR COADJUTORS.—Quite a breeze was raised in the Senate of the State of New York on Sixth-day last, relative to gambling and gamblers. It seems that some weeks ago a bill was submitted to the Senate, providing more effectually for the suppression of gambling. It was referred to a Select Committee, and that is the last that the public or the Legislature have heard of it. But it is now charged, that soon after the bill was referred, Mr. Bull, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, came to New York, and applied to a boss gambler named Suydam for money to disburse at Albany in the business of stopping the passage of the bill. At a later period, he applied again, professing to have engaged two Senators to speak against the bill, should it come up, in order to defeat it; and finally, when the Legislature were recently in this city, he procured the signatures of the members of the Select Committee to a statement that it was now so late in the session that there was no probability that the bill would be acted upon. A Committee of Investigation has the whole matter in charge, and in due season will report on the guilt or innocence of the parties implicated.

FREE SCHOOLS IN NEW YORK.—A Bill is now before the Legislature of New York, which in effect abandons the principle of Free Schools. It proposes to levy a State Tax of eight hundred thousand dollars, which amount is to be devoted to the support of Common Schools, and all expenses in excess are to be defrayed by rate-bills. Instead of throwing the school-house doors open to all, and so removing all excuse for staying away, as the people have repeatedly voted should be done, it seems that we are to come back upon the old platform. The bill passed the Assembly by a vote of 72 to 23. Its fate in the Senate is not yet known.

Ohio on the Fugitive Slave Law.

The following resolutions, condemning the Fugitive Slave Law, and demanding its repeal or modification, passed both branches of the Ohio Legislature by decided votes:—

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That while this General Assembly would urge the faithful observance of law upon all the people of this State, and of her sister States of the Union, as the most effectual mode of promoting their best interests, as well as a high duty they owe alike to themselves and their common country, it would most earnestly recommend to Congress the necessity of so amending and modifying the provisions of the Fugitive Slave Law, that while it secures a faithful compliance with all the obligations imposed by the Constitution of the United States, it will, as it becomes a free Government, guard with a jealous care the rights of the freeman. And if said law, in the opinion of Congress, cannot be so amended as to give to persons claimed as fugitives from labor, the benefit of every legal defense of their liberty, we then recommend the repeal of said law.

Resolved, That the law, commonly called the Fugitive Slave Law, being a law that makes ex parte evidence conclusive of the master's right to recapture and return his slave; that denies a jury trial here or elsewhere; that provides for the appointment of swarms of petty officers to execute it; that gives a double compensation to find every claim set up in favor of the master, and pays the expenses, in any case, from the Public Treasury—ought never to receive the voluntary coöperation of our people, and ought therefore to be immediately repealed.

SACKETT'S HARBOR AND SARATOGA RAILROAD.—The law authorizing a company to construct the Sackett's Harbor and Saratoga Railroad, was passed April 10th, 1848. It directed the Controller to sell to the company, as often as it expended $25,000 east of Carthage, and paid into the treasury 5 cents per acre, 25,000 acres of land, to be selected in alternate sections of not less than 1,000 nor more than 2,000 acres, until there shall have been conveyed to them 250,000 acres of land in the counties of Herkimer and Hamilton. The charter gave the company three years to organize. During the last year, individuals living near the line in the counties of Jefferson and Lewis, procured the survey of the road, with a thorough exploration of the country through which it passes, at an expense of not less than $4,000. The necessary amount of stock was subscribed, and a day appointed to meet and organize. The lands which it is proposed to sell to the company are in the heart of an unbroken wilderness, being back of the celebrated John Brown's Tract, which, after being held by that family for almost a century, were sold during the past year at 11½ cents per acre, or about $18,000.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENT WITH CANADA.—We see it announced, that Hon. James Morris, Postmaster General of Canada, has succeeded in negotiating a Postal Arrangement with Mr. Hall, our Postmaster General at Washington, which is to go into effect soon. It provides that sealed bags be made up in the United States for the principal offices in Canada, and similar bags to be made up in Canada for the United States. The postage is to be the same on each side of the line; that is, letters not exceeding half an ounce to be charged five cents to the line from any part of the United States, and five cents to any place within the Province. The postage can be prepaid or not, at the option of the writer. The postage on newspapers and pamphlets is to be prepaid to the line, as heretofore. [N. Y. Tribune.

TORNADO.—We learn from the Minden (La.) Herald, that the town of Bellevue, in that State, was recently visited by a tornado which prostrated to the ground nearly every house in the place. Fortunately, however, no person was seriously hurt, though several were buried beneath the ruins. The storm is represented as having twisted off trees fifteen or twenty feet from the root, and swept the tops clear away. The wind was preceded by a rumbling noise similar to that which usually precedes the shock of an earthquake, and was distinctly heard a distance of eight or nine miles.

FATAL EXPLOSION AT THE MINES.—The Pittsburgh (Pa.) Gazette announces an unprecedented and fatal explosion which occurred at one of the mines of the Pa. Coal Co., at Port Griffith, on Friday morning last. The explosion took place from the ignition of a large amount of fire damp that had accumulated in the mine, and resulted in the death of three of the miners and the severe injury of five others. Fortunately no one was in the mines at the time, but near a dozen persons were standing around the entrance. Two of the number were instantly killed—one being blown to the distance of one hundred and fifty yards, and the other about fifty. A third, Michael Ryan, was driven through the side of the engine house, breaking through a four-by-seven joice of timber in his passage, and yet, strange to tell, not a bone in his body was broken, and his recovery is considered quite probable. The engine house connected with the mines was partially demolished, while the fixtures at the entrance of the slope and the shattered timbers of the railroad entering the mines, were scattered to a great distance in every direction.

A DAY'S LABOR IN NEW JERSEY.—The act recently passed by the Legislature of New Jersey to limit the hours of labor, and to prevent the employment of children in factories, under ten years of age, provides that ten hours shall be considered a legal day's labor in all cotton, woolen, silk, paper, glass and flax factories, and in manufactories of iron and brass. It further provides that hereafter no minor engaged in any factory shall be holden or required to work more than ten hours on any day, or sixty hours in any week; and that hereafter no minor shall be admitted as a worker, under the age of ten years, in any factory within this State, and makes the penalty incurred by any owner or employer for violating the provisions fifty dollars for each offense, to be sued and recovered in an action of debt, in the name of the Overseer of the Poor, for the benefit of such minor.

LIFE IN SANTA FE.—A letter published in the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, dated Santa Fé, January 29, has the following:—

"I have calculated the number of square miles of the territory for the Marshal, and they amount to 199,027½. The population is between 49,000 and 50,000. About one in every five hundred can read and write.

"The amount of stock run off by the Indians since August, 1846, is immense. In Santa Anna and Bernalilla counties it amounts, at a very low estimate, to near $300,000 in value. Dr. Connelly's loss alone is $50,000, and Jose Chavery's about $60,000. The Doctor is now buying back his mules at $25 per head from the Jicarillas, who are now and have been living near Mazanas since last October."

A NEW KIND OF FENCE.—Mr. John R. Remington, Alabama, (the inventor of the Remington Ærial Bridge,) has patented a new and useful invention. It is a cement for making solid fences, as durable as granite, and at a very reasonable cost of construction. The chief ingredient is sand, and it can be easily manufactured by plantation hands. The cement panels are conveyed to the spot where the fence is to be located, and the two legs of each let into the ground like common posts. The cost to the planter is estimated at 10 cents per panel of ten feet by five—four inches thick—far cheaper than the wire fence.

AN EMIGRANT SHIP.—The packet ship Washington, Capt. Page, from Liverpool, arrived at New York last Sunday, after a somewhat boisterous passage of 36 days, during which she lost her main top-mast and fore and mizzen top-gallant-masts with sails attached. She brings 5 cabin and 956 steerage passengers, making a grand total, including officers and crew, of 1,010 souls, all in good health, not one of them having been lost during the passage. This is, perhaps, the greatest number of human beings ever conveyed across the Atlantic to this or any other port in a single vessel. Captain Page has brought over to this country, in four consecutive voyages, the enormous number of 3,500 emigrants. [Tribune.

FRAUD IN CLOTH.—Thompson's New York Commercial Reporter says that a great demand has risen for rag wool, large sales having been made at 6 and 21½ cents. The wool is obtained from taking old made-up clothing and reducing it to a state of wool, which manufacturers buy to mix with new wool, so as to reduce the cost of cloth, but at the expense of its strength. The appearance of the cloth so made is equally good with that made entirely from new wool. This rag wool is technically called "shoddy."

Pemberton, sentenced to two years in the State Prison for Post Office robbery, has been pardoned by President Fillmore, after remaining in confinement one month. His revelations and testimony were the means of securing the conviction of Bramhall and Gaylor, and the flight of another of a gang, which seemed to have organized and systematized crime as a business, and to have followed it for years with impunity. Most of the citizens petitioned for the pardon, and Judge Conkling, of the U. S. Court, at which the trials were had, advised it and approved it. So says the Albany Atlas.

The Supreme Court of California, (Chief Justice Hastings, Associate Justices Bannett and Lyons,) have decided, in the case of Woodworth vs. Fulton and Hersh, that grants of lands in California made by American officers or appointees, during the period that the country was in military possession of the Americans, and before the treaty of peace was signed, are of no validity.

The Albany papers are publishing a call for a meeting at Oneonta, on the 22d of April, for the purpose of organizing a Company, to be called the Albany and Susquehannah Railroad Company, the object of which is to build a Railroad from Albany to some point on the New York and Erie Railroad near Binghamton.

Knickerbocker Magazine for 1851.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

IN one of the chapters of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, yet in force, there is a declaration, "That the encouragement of the Arts and the Sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America." It has ever been the highest purpose of the Knickerbocker to elevate the standard of American Literature. It has been the medium of introducing many of our most popular authors to the public. To those who take a pride in sustaining a good American Magazine, entirely national in its character, we look for support. Men of judgment need not be told that it is impossible to get up a Magazine entirely original at the same prices at which those made up from foreign sources are sold. The unremitted efforts of the Editor and Publisher will be continued to improve the work.

Miscellaneous.

"Lo! the Poor Indian."

The history of the red man on this continent (says the Christian Watchman and Reflector) is full of the most touching incident. Our Pilgrim Fathers, nearly two and a half centuries ago, found them in the wild enjoyment of their forest life, and then saw them gradually disappearing from New England, until the name of but few of their chiefs remained to indicate their once powerful existence. From the Hudson to the Great Lakes, from the waters of Erie, and Huron, and Michigan, to the Mississippi, and even to the Pacific, the same terrible and melancholy story of their extinction is every where engraven upon forest, and plain, and mountain. The age of gold but precedes the epoch of death to an entire race. Go southward, and all is the same. The white man advances, the red man recedes. War scatters its horrors for a while, and the native occupant of the land breathes with its smoke the air of independence; but the "Great Father" sends his "big men" to have a "talk" with the famished and stricken warriors, and the "white path of peace" is entered upon by these pilgrims towards extinction and oblivion.

We hardly know how to characterize the emotions that have come over us in reading the speeches of certain Texan chiefs at a late "talk" near the San Saba river. The bravest warriors of their race have at last yielded to the mandates of an inexorable necessity, and uttered their pangs in "thoughts that breathe and words that burn." Here is the speech of Buffalo Hump, a Camanche chief. When was appeal more eloquent, more touching, more overpowering? He is replying to the treaty propositions of the U. S. Agent:—

"All my red brethren here are the same—they have heard you talk with a big heart. My belly is full of love for you—my red brethren are the same. We hope in time that the white people and the red men will be the same. Since we have heard you talk we believe the Great Father has given you a big white heart to make a big white road to the house of the red man. We think you have told the truth, and believe there will be peace. We believe you have come to make the great white road of peace. If any drop of blood is found in it, we believe you have power to remove it. My red brethren here all believe the same. They love you, and hope you will not tire. I want you to look at me and all my people here good. We are poor, and we hope you will take pity on us. The white man has taken our lands from us. We were once great, but now we are small. We see the great waters no more; our sun goes down in the earth. We have been friendly for a good while—we have been friendly since peace was first declared, and we will not tire. I will not take any thing bad into my heart. I do not want to fight—I do not want war. My red brethren all believe you are not hiding anything from them—that you do not speak with two tongues—that you are telling the truth. I hope you will let us have soon the prisoner boo who is among you. If we are brothers you will let us have him. We agree to your talk in what you have said, and I have nothing more to say."

Chi-ki-to, chief of the Lipans, spoke:—

"The Great Father has told me to be good. I was at the great talk long ago on the Brazos, and I call the Great Father, the Sun, and my Mother, the Moon, to witness that since that time I have been friendly toward the white man. Twenty-six years ago the first white man came among us. We then lived towards the sun, by the great waters. The white man said he come to seek his children—that he would give me his heart, and he take mine, and that we would be the same people. We did so, and I now call on the earth and sun, which never lies, to hear me—that since that time I have been the same. After this there were other white men came, and covered our lands, but I have always been friendly. The white man has killed my people, and taken our lands from us, but we have since made peace, and the blood is wiped out and we are friendly. I have heard you talk of the "big tree" (the white man) and the "little bush" (the red man,) and I hope the little bush may flourish under the big tree. My heart is made glad with your talk. I love peace—I love my wife, my children, and my horse. When I lie down, I want to lie down in peace.

"All my red brethren are the same, and it makes us all feel glad that you have expressed to us the great white path of peace. I am resolved to walk in it. Some of my red brethren may get out of it but I hope not. You talk of a line so that we may know our lands. We hope that you will not forget it, and that we may be friends. I have buried the tomahawk far in the earth, and I hope the grass may grow over it. Some of the tribes may dig it up, but I hope never to see it again. Some of my Northern brethren may steal, and I cannot help it, but I will come in and tell you. I hope you will not blame my people for this. I hope you will let us live in this country—it is our home—I have lived in it since a little boy, and the graves of my ancestors are here."

A chief of the Caddoes made but a short speech. The head chief was absent, and the orator present had but little to say. But what a power of emotion must have burst forth from every bosom, when he uttered these words: "You see we are poor, and often hungry. The buffalo and the antelope have nearly disappeared from our prairies, and the deer from among our hills, and we are left alone. I hope you will have pity on us."

We can give but one speech more. It is that of A-qua-quosh, head chief of the Wacoes:—

"Now all you white brethren see me standing here, and I take the Great Father to witness that I am going to tell the truth. I talk in the light, and the Great Father, the President, hears me. I was at Washington and saw the Great Father; and the Great Father told me to be good, to keep peace, that when he sent a good man among us, to believe him. We all believe you are good, and we listen to your talk. I took the great white road of peace long ago, and I am not yet tired. I have a small village on the Brazos, and some of my men are bad and sometimes steal from the white man. I have always done all I could to prevent it, and I sometimes expect they will kill me; but I am not afraid; I will be good to the end. I know my heart has always been good toward the white man ever since I saw him a long time ago, and I will not change. I consider the white man the same as our own people; they have the same blood, live in the same earth, eat the same meat, drink the same water, and are the same.

"The Great Spirit has made our hearts all the same. Some of my red brethren Witchetaws live away over Red River. They sometimes steal horses and come to my town. It makes my heart cry. I sometimes try to take them. Since I first made peace I have found it the best, and I will try and keep it. I once fought much myself, but now live in peace and think it good. My red brethren here all determined to take the stolen horses and give them back to the white man. I am not afraid to talk to my people; they now hear me; they may kill me; you may hear of my death, but I am not afraid; I have heard your talk and like it, and have nothing more to say."

Good Breeding.

The following anecdote is related by Mr. Walker in his amusing and instructive publication, "The Original," as affording a fine instance of the value of good breeding or politeness, even in circumstances where it could not be expected to produce any personal advantage:—

"An Englishman making the grand tour, towards the middle of the last century, when travelers were more objects of attention, than at present, on arriving at Turin, sauntered out to see the place. He happened to meet a regiment of infantry returning from the parade, and taking a position to see it pass, a young captain, evidently desirous to make a display before the stranger, in crossing one of the numerous water courses, with which the city intersected missed his footing, and in trying to save himself, lost his hat. The exhibition was truly unfortunate—the spectators laughed, and looked at the Englishman, expecting him to laugh too. On the contrary he not only retained his composure but promptly advanced to where the hat had rolled, and taking it up, presented it with an air of unaffected kindness, to its owner. The officer received it with a blush of surprise and gratitude, and hurried to rejoin his company. There was a murmur of surprise, and the stranger passed on. Though the scene of a moment, and without a word spoken, it touched every heart—not with admiration for a mere display of politeness, but with a warmer feeling for a true charity "which never faileth." On the regiment being dismissed, the captian, who was a young man of consideration, in glowing terms related the circumstance to his colonel. The colonel immediately mentioned it to the general in command; and when the Englishman returned to his hotel, he found an aid-de-camp waiting to request his company to dinner at head-quarters. In the evening he was carried to court—at that time, as Lord Chesterfield tells us, the most brilliant court in Europe—and was received with particular attention. Of course, during his stay at Turin, he was invited every where; and on his departure he was loaded with letters of introduction to the different States of Italy. Thus a private gentleman of moderate means, by a grateful impulse of Christian feeling, was enabled to travel through a foreign country, then of the highest interest for its society, as well as for the charms it still possesses, with more real distinction and advantage than can ever be derived from the mere circumstances of birth and fortune, even the most splendid.

The Prison at Washington.

Written by Grace Greenwood for the National Era.

Yesterday we visited the Prison and the Infirmary, both of which deserve a better notice than I can give them here. At the former place we were mostly interested by Captains Sayres and Drayton, of the "Pearl." We found them as comfortable and cheerful as we had expected. Drayton says he suffers most from the vile companionship which he is called to endure. The jailor, who is a very gentlemanly person, spoke in high terms of these two prisoners. As I looked into the melancholy faces of these men, suffering so deeply and hopelessly through long years, for the crime of helping their oppressed and degraded brothers to the freedom they themselves inherited and loved, sharp was the pain at my heart; bitter, and I fear impatient, the cry of my soul, "How long, Oh Lord! how long?" I was glad to hear that Mr. Drayton, who impressed me as a very sincere, earnest man, was shortly to be removed to more comfortable quarters. I hope that he may be allowed a room to himself, for with all his submission and faith, he can scarcely be otherwise than wretched where he now is.

It was beautiful to witness Jagello's sympathy with these unfortunate men. She, simple girl, could see no difference between helping American slaves to obtain their freedom, and inciting Hungarian peasants to revolt against Austrian tyranny—or rescuing Polish exiles condemned to Siberia. Ah, when will she learn the grand American creed, that God is a partial Father, who made of one blood all the nations of the earth—save Ethopians, whom He created to unbosom himself of a great curse, and to wreak an eternal hate?—when will she learn our fundamental Republican principle, that "all men are created equal"—except "niggers?" But I fear her truthful, child-like mind will never come up to such hights of wisdom.

"Could no one convince you that slavery is right?" said Mrs. B—— to her, the other day.

"Not the Lord himself!" she answered, in a deep, firm voice, and with one of her clear, brilliant glances.

The Law Magazine relates an anecdote of Sergeant Davy, a distinguished English lawyer at the time of Lord Mansfield, that being once called to account by his brethren on the western circuit, for disgracing the profession, by accepting silver of a client, he replied: "I took silver because I could not get gold; but I took every sixpence the fellow had in the world, and I hope you don't call that disgracing the profession."

Extensive Cavern in Manchester, Vt.

From the Union Whig of March 19.

A large and singularly beautiful cave was discovered in Manchester, Vt., on the 7th instant, by a party of young men engaged in a hunting excursion, and one of whom is the writer of this communication. The cave is situated upon the Southern extremity of the Equinox mountain, about half way from the base to the summit. The individual who made the discovery was in hot pursuit of a wounded partridge at the moment, and was precipitated without notice into the unseen entrance.

On examining the passage into which one of their number had been so unceremoniously invited, the party found that it led, by a gradual descent of about 30 feet, into a spacious apartment, measuring 36 feet in length, 27 feet in breadth, and 13 feet in hight, and having a bottom as level, and almost as smooth, as a floor. From this room, a narrow passage, through which we made our way with great difficulty, and not without bruises, brought us into an apartment far exceeding the former, both in extent and magnificence. The most prominent objects which met our eyes in this second room, were three colossal pillars, 20 feet in hight, and 15 feet in circumference, of spectral whiteness, and smooth as polished marble.

In the third room we found considerable quantities of iron and lead, together with a kind of ore resembling silver.

Not to weary your readers with further details, we pursued our way about a quarter of a mile, passing through no less than nine apartments, until we found ourselves upon the brink of a precipice. On throwing down a large stone, a faint splash was returned, after an interval of several seconds, from which we inferred the existence of a pond of water at the bottom of the abyss.

The exploration of the cavern has been pursued no further. The whole, as far as our examination extended, and with the exception of the water just mentioned, is perfectly dry.

Temperance Facts.

The following startling statements relate to eight different families in a single town. The parents were moderate drinkers! Can heads of families read these facts without concern?

The first had one child, a daughter. A great sum was expended on her education. She died from the effects of strong drink.

The second had an only son. He was educated with great care, but was killed by wine.

The third had four sons and one daughter. The daughter is a drunkard, and one son has gone to a drunkard's grave.

The fourth had three sons. One died of intemperance, one was killed in a duel, and the other is a drunkard.

The fifth had one son who killed himself by drinking, and two step sons who are drunkards on wine.

The sixth had five sons. Two are dead through intemperance, and another is a drunkard.

The seventh had five sons. Four are drunkards, and one through the influence of liquor, is an idiot.

The eighth had five sons and three nephews. Four of the sons have been killed by alcohol, and the fifth is a drunkard; and the three nephews are in the drunkard's grave. [N. Y. Casket.

The Devil and the Priest.

All the population of Brunn, in the Austrian States, were recently thrown into commotion by the appearance of the Devil, in proporia persona, surrounded by gendarmes with drawn swords. His Satanic Majesty was, as he is always represented, perfectly black, with two enormous horns, goat's ears, a body covered with hair, horse's legs, and cloven feet; but he seemed decidedly out of spirits, and it appeared that he was undergoing the indignity of being conveyed to durance vile. On inquiry the following facts were stated:—A few days before, as a peasant women named Hunt was lying in bed, after having been delivered of child, the Devil suddenly leaped through a window, clanking a chain, and demanded that she should either give him the child to be carried to the regions below, or make over to him a sum of 100 florins in new silver, which he knew she had collected. The poor women, greatly terrified, at once produced the money, and the Devil pocketed it; after which he went away. The next day the women told the parish priest of the visit she had received, and added that she had collected the florins penny by penny to pay for religious services on her accouchement. "Did you tell any one that you had the money?" asked the priest. "Only the midwife," said she. "Well, tell the midwife that the Devil was mistaken in supposing that you had only 100 florins, for that you have 50 florins more; and say that you are glad he did not compel you to give them up. The Devil will perhaps pay you another visit after that, but I will be there to exorcise him." The woman told the midwife what the priest had said. The next night the Devil re-appeared and demanded the 50 florins, but at the same moment the priest rushed forth, seized him by the neck, and charged him with being a thief. The Devil, it turned out, was the husband of the midwife. He was fastened in a room, and the next morning was taken to prison.

A Cure for Neuralgia.

A young doctor of the Paris Faculty of Medicine, says the Courrier des Etats Unis, has made a discovery, which we deem of importance to communicate to our readers. Neuralgic affections are, of all others, the most impervious to the art of medicine. M. Desterne, profoundly convinced of the science in those affections, so common and so terrible, has devoted himself zealously to researches upon the physiological action of the nervous system. Taking for the starting point of his researches the remarkable results of the cure of Neuralgia by the cauterization of the "helix," he has discovered a method of curing instantaneously, and without disturbing any organ, all Neuralgic affections of the head, attacks of megrim, and pains resulting from teeth in an advanced state of decay. What renders this discovery truly marvellous, is the promptness at once of the cure, and its perfect success in more than two hundred cases, which have presented themselves since the 22d of December, the date of the first experiments. M. Desterne purposes presenting to the Academy of Medicine a memoir upon this important discovery. The presentation of the memoir is only retarded by the hope which the author entertains of preventing, by the same means, hysterical and epileptic attacks, and his desire to make a more complete work.

College Statistics.—At a Concert of Prayer for Colleges, held in Boston on the last Thursday in February, the following interesting statistics were presented:—

In the year 1849, there were five revivals in various institutions; and since 1741, when the first revival occurred in Yale, there have been about 100 revivals in 37 different Colleges and in 18 different States, but mostly in New England. 84 Colleges have had no revival. A number have had but 1; Bowdoin, 4; Nassau Hall, 4; Illinois, 5; Amherst, 7; Marietta, 7; Wabash, 8; Williams, 9; Middlebury, 10; Yale, 21.

The number of Colleges in the United States is 121; and the number of students is about 11,000. In our 43 Theological Seminaries, 22 Law Schools, and 45 Medical Schools, we have about 6,000 more young men. In Great Britain there are 60 Colleges and 384 professors. Oxford and Cambridge have 41 Colleges, and nearly 13,000 students, and in the other Colleges one-third more—in all making 17,000 training in these schools. In the Universities of Germany are 18,000 students; in France, 12,000 students, 7,000 in Paris alone; 10,000 in the Spanish Universities, and in the European Universities are not far from 80,000.

Qeenston Suspension Bridge.—This second structure which spans Niagara River has recently been opened to the public. The towers are built on each side, and it is 1,043 feet wide from tower to tower. There are to be ten cables in all, each cable made of 250 wires; each wire warranted to bear 1,500 pounds. The cables are firmly anchored in the rock, and pass over two massy stone towers, some 14 feet high. The cables, when extended, have the shape of a rainbow turned upside down. Instead of the planking and pathway being over the cables, it is under them, and the work to be sustained by iron rods suspended from the cables. The planking to be 20 feet wide, intended at present for teams. It is said to be the greatest suspension bridge in the world. [Buffalo Com. Adv.

A New Crusade.—It is stated in a late number of the Allgemeine Zeitung, that the Austrian Ultramontaine party is preparing considerable difficulties for Prince Schwarzenburgh, by its zeal for an object which the Christian world has abandoned—the recovery of Jerusalem and the Holy Sepulchre from the hands of the Mahometans. The purpose of the crusades is to be revived, but it is to be pursued by the way of diplomacy, not by war. It is stated that the Catholic powers, with the connivance of Austria, intend to obtain possession (it is not precisely defined how) of all the sacred spots of the Holy Land, which will be made over to the Catholic Church. The Order of the Holy Sepulchre will be raised to the importance once possessed by the Knights Templars. The Pope is to be the Grand Master, and one Prince of every Catholic State of Europe is to be created Grand Prior.

City of Rio.—A census of Rio de Janeiro City, Brazil, taken in the latter part of the year 1849, showed a total population there of 205,806 inhabitants. In the city and surrounding districts there were 266,466 inhabitants, of which number 154,093 were born in Brazil, and 112,373 born in foreign countries. Of the native Brazilians, 75,748 were men, and 35,156 women. Of the persons of foreign birth, 77,217 were men, and 35,156 women. The large proportion of foreigners has been caused by the constant influx of slaves from Africa. There were 43,129 men and 22,871 women slaves classed among the foreigners. Of the free popula- 14,713 men were married, 2,503 widowers, 69, 653 single; 12,963 females were married, 6,213 widows, and 49,314.

Price of Autographs.—An interesting collection of autographs was sold at auction at London on the 2d instant. A letter of Beethoven brought $13; one of Edward Burke on the Catholic question, $10 50; one of S. T. Coleridge, $14; a collection of letters by Philip Doddridge, most of which have been published, $65; 48 official letters of Marshal Ney, $25; a letter of Pius IX., $8; a signature of Archbishop Angus, who married the widow of James IV. of Scotland, $5 60; a letter of the Regent Morton, $8; a letter of Cardinal Beatoun, $8; the original Manifesto of the old Pretender James III. to the English people shortly before the attempt of the Prince Charles Edward, $55; a private letter of the same personage, $15.

Variety.

The St. Louis Republican contains a notice of a trial of incombustible hempen rope, recently made in that city. A piece of prepared rope and a piece of wire rope were put into a blacksmith's fire. The heat was intense enough to weld the strands of the wire rope together, while the hempen rope was only slightly charred on the outside. Another test was made; the piece of rope and a small bar of iron were placed in the same fire, and the iron brought to white heat; yet the cordage was but little, if any, more affected by the fire than in the previous experiment.

A very singular and extraordinary marriage took place in this city yesterday, says the Madison (Ind.) Banner. The names of the happy couple made man and wife are Mr. Thomas Shores and Mrs. Susan Anderson, whose united ages number over one hundred and forty years, or seventy years each. What is still more extraordinary about this youthful and newly wedded pair, is that the minister who united them in the holy bands of wedlock is the son of the happy bride.

A medical gentleman has adopted the excellent plan of fixing a gutta-percha mouth-piece by the side of his bell-handle at the street-door, and attached to the mouth-piece is a long gutta-percha tube, which reaches to his bed. In the night, when the bell is rung, the tube, which hangs suspended by the bedside, is immediately resorted to, and a conversation is carried on without the necessity of the doctor even rising from his pillow.

On a comparison of plank roads with macadamized roads, it is estimated that the latter will cost $3,500 per mile, and to keep them in repair seven years, $1,040 more, total $4,540. The first cost of a plank road is $1,750, seven years' repairs $70, relaying, as good as new, $1,486, total $3,101; making a gain in favor of plank of $1,434 in seven years, or 31 per cent.

It is said by the Daily News, on the authority of Mr. Porter, that the poor "earners" of Great Britain expend yearly, in spirits, beer, and tobacco, fifty-seven millions sterling—($287,000,000,) of which one-third to one-half finds its way into the exchequer—twenty to twenty-five millions—while most of the other taxes, except the income tax, are also graduated against the poor and in favor of the rich.

The evidences of the great resources of Western Texas are every day increasing. Carts are sent out and the salt is shoveled in with little labor and expense.

A great Cathedral is projected by the Roman Catholics in Washington City. It is estimated to cost $1,000,000 and is to be paid for by contributions from all the Catholics in the Union, and by donations from Europe. A lot of ground 300 feet square has been secured for it.

THE EQUALITY OF THE RACES.

Reply to D. E. Maxson.

Notwithstanding the labored discussions of my friend, I confess that I still remain ignorant, not which nations were Negroes, but that either Euclid, Æsop, the fathers of the Christian church, or the renowned nations of antiquity, were of that race. The position that Euclid was a Negro, according to the testimony of history, must be abandoned. That Æsop was not a Negro, is positively certain; and the mistake from which such an erroneous conclusion originated, is easily explained from the following account. In volume 10th of the Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, published in 1848, we find, under the article Lokman, that a very distinguished personage of that name once resided in the East. "He was an Arabian, and a slave for some time. It is related, that he was born in the time of David, and lived till the age of the prophet Jonas. Some have erroneously supposed him to be the same with Æsop the mythologist; and, indeed, we find in the parables or apologues of Lokman, in Arabic, many particulars that are found in Æsop's fables; so that it is not easy to determine whether the Greek or the Arabian are the originals. Some pieces of his are extant; and he was looked upon as so excellent a person, that Mahomet has introduced a chapter of the Koran, called after his name, in which God is represented as saying, 'We heretofore bestowed wisdom on Lokman.' His fables were translated into French by Mr. Galland." From this statement two points are established—first, that Æsop himself was a Greek; second, that he has sometimes been confounded with another person, who, though not a Negro, was a resident in Asiatic Ethiopia.

My friend has abundantly established his position that the ancient Egyptian and Ethiopian nations were the immediate descendants of Ham, by his sons Cush and Mizraim, but he has failed to prove that the patriarch himself was a Negro. According to the invariable law of nature, and his own admission in a former article, "like always produces like." Hebraic scholars are unanimous in their testimony that Shem and Ham were twins. To Shem, as the father of the chosen race, is deputed the precedence; thus we hear of Shem, Ham, and Japheth, although Japheth was the elder son. The name of Ham follows that of Shem, because he was produced at the same birth. Shem signifies the fair twin; Ham the swarthy twin. Now I leave it to any sane man to decide, whether the twin offspring of the same parents could be, one a white man, the other a negro. Therefore, physiologically, Ham and Shem were identical in race; and we know positively, that Shem and his descendants were white men. The name of Ham was by the Egyptians preserved in the name of their country. The meaning of the Hebrew root, Ham, is dark, brown of color; no less than heat, and especially solar heat. In Coptic it has precisely the same signification, and in Arabic it means swarthy, as, for instance, unbleached linen is called goomash-kham, but in no Semitic language does Ham, as a color, mean strictly black. To this connection between the brothers may be attributed the fact that the Hebrews always exhibited a remarkable predilection for the Egyptians; and the same applies to the languages of these two nations, which, according to Dr. Leipsius, and many others, are of the same root. The same eminent scholar has proved the affinities between the Indo-Germanic, Semitic, and Coptic languages to be identical, proceeding from one common origin, in one primeval source.

According to the concurrent testimony of Hebrew scholars, in the general allotment of territories to the offspring of Ham, Egypt was assigned to Mizraim, son of Ham, and grandson of Noah, as a domain, and for an inheritance. Thither he must have proceeded from the banks of the Euphrates, in Asia, accompanied probably by Ham, his father; an instance not incompatible with patriarchal longevity, and the silence of Scripture. Moreover, it is generally conceded, that the emigration of Mizraim was antecedent to the dispersion of the other tribes from the plain of Shinar. We learn, in Genesis, that the great grandson of Noah was Peleg. In Hebrew the meaning of the word Peleg is, to sever, separate; and between the apparently peaceful immigration of the patriarchal grandchildren, while the people were all one, and while they journeyed from the east to the west, and their forcible dispersion subsequent to the events of Babel, there is, chronologically, an intervening interval of sixty years, or even of a longer period.

It has been claimed by many, that the wrath of the Almighty at Babel only fell upon certain rebel tribes, of Cush and Canaan, and not upon all mankind, nor upon all the descendants of these two semi-patriarchs. Here a question of great interest arises. We are informed by the holy text, that the people were one; if so, they could not have been part white and part black men, with the difference of osteological conformation exhibited by the two races. If the Almighty saw fit to confuse their language as a punishment, there is nothing inconsistent in the supposition that he changed their color likewise, at the same time, and for the same reason. They would thus be more effectually prevented from mixing and amalgamating with their more virtuous brethren. The assumption that Ham was a Negro, is unsupported by scripture, by history, or by tradition; consequently it is perfectly ridiculous in itself. Independent of miraculous interposition, we have no more reason for deducing the Negro tribes from him than from Shem or Japheth. His blood was the same with that of his brothers; and the three, like their father, were pure Caucasians. Cush and Mizraim, his sons, were also Caucasians. The family of the latter, with a portion of that of the former, departed peacefully, in the days of Peleg, to their inheritance on the banks of the Nile; neither had they been subject to Noah's prophetic malediction, which fell not on Cush, nor Mizraim, nor Phut, but on Canaan. "Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants let him be." I have indeed produced the testimony of two renowned antiquarians, that the Negro tribes are descendants of Canaan; but I have not assumed that Canaan himself was transmuted into a Negro by Noah's curse; and even had such been the case, it by no means follows that all his posterity must necessarily have been of that race, since he might have been a parent previous to the pronunciation of that malediction, and that portion of his family might have been preserved from its baneful consequences. I readily grant, that there have been illustrious nations of Canaanites; but these nations were not Negroes, neither were they of that portion of the family of Canaan, upon whom the wrath of God descended at Babel. Where did my friend learn that the Phœnicians were Negroes—an assumption utterly at variance with historical testimony? Taking for granted that the events of Babel produced the difference in the color and osteological conformation of the human race, we can readily perceive why a certain portion of that race have always held preëminence above the rest. It would naturally hold, in the first place, that those who had preserved their purity would shun the society, and avoid amalgamation with the impure; and, in the second place, that prejudice, originating from any cause, would continue after the knowledge of the source whence it was first produced had ceased to exist. Ham, like his father, like his twin brother Shem the type of the Hebrews, like Japheth the type of the Europeans, was a Caucasian and an Asiatic. It is therefore perfecly in accordance with all known natural causes to find his posterity exhibiting the same conformation. According to facts set forth in Morton's Crania Egyptiaca, we find the Caucasians inhabiting Egypt at the earliest records of time. They inhabit Egypt at this day; it has always been inhabited by them. The reader may judge who has reared the man of straw.

My friend, in his last article, says, "I have shown, by reference to the Ethiopian and Egyptian nations, that the Negro race has produced examples of mental development equal to other races." But, granting the utmost that he claims, that these nations were Negroes, fails to establish his position that the races are equal in intellectual capacity. Shall these two nations, produced at a remote period of time, and of whose civilization we have the most dubious and conflicting statements, be considered as establishing an equality with the long succession of illustrious Caucasian nations, whose genius has illumined the world for so many ages? We hear that Greece borrowed her arts from Egypt; but what were they? The divine arts of sculpture, poetry, and statuary? No. To rear huge monuments, quite as useless as stupendous. We hear, likewise, that the utmost stretch of modern invention has been unable to imitate the lost arts of Egypt. What of it? We have been excelled in some particulars by the American Indians. We hear that Caucasian civilization originated from the Negroes; which is really absurd, even granting that the Egyptians were of that race. The ancient Babylonian empire, of Caucasian origin, was of equal antiquity with Egypt, and far ahead of that nation in the arts and sciences. For proofs of this, I refer my reader to the Bibliotheque Orientale, and M. de Anquetil's Life of Zoroaster, with the same gentleman's translation of the writings of that sage.

My friend says that I have described the Negro through the pen of Hugh Murray, and deny that the Ethiopian has these characteristics. This is partly true, and partly not. I have described that race as divisible to three varieties. The same course has been pursued by many eminent naturalists. I have nowhere said that the Negroes were not Ethiopians, but I have said that a man or a nation might be referable to that race who exhibited few if any Negro traits. To substantiate this, I refer my reader to the article in the Sabbath Recorder of Feb. 27.

For the latitude in which Blumenbach employs the term Ethiopian, and for his appreciation of the law of change, the reader may consult the writings of that eminent naturalist himself, or the Encyclopedia of Geography, published by the British Royal Society.

In the quotation from Mary Sommerville, we hear "that Ethiopians inhabit all Africa south of the Great Desert." If by Ethiopians we are to understand Negroes, and that the whole country is occupied by them exclusively, the assumption is so utterly at variance with well known facts, as hardly to require a refutation. The merest school-boy knows, that a proportion of South Africa is inhabited by the Dutch; that the Portuguese, for the last two centuries, have possessed flourishing colonies upon the eastern coast; and that Cape Colony is tenanted by the British; if, indeed, these have not become subject to that marvelous law of change, "which, by two weeks exposure to the sun, is sufficient to change the color of the human face, so as to be scarcely recognizable." (Whatever it may do to the face, it cannot change the color of the human race, which was what I said.) Subject to this law, they have probably been transmuted into negroes. Moreover, the kingdom of Narea, a part of ancient Ethiopia, is, at this day, inhabited by people as white as Sicilians or Neapolitans, the descendants of the ancient inhabitants, whose long flowing hair, of various shades of color, is an unquestionable proof of their Caucasian origin. The neighboring country is intersected by Negro tribes, emigrants from the interior; but neither party, so far as I am aware, have been subjected to the influences of that marvelous law—more marvelous, by far, since locality so potent in one place is impotent in another—having no influence over the Abyssinian, but admitting that the Egyptians should first be red according to Hamilton, then black according to Herodotus, and lastly chocolate color. We hope really that the next change will be to white. Who my friend includes in the scientific world, or in the best of scientific writers, I do not know; but probably some might think that Dr. Barriere, Lord Kames, Bayle, Lawrence, Sumner, and Pritchard, to say nothing of Prof. Agassiz and Dr. Nott, were entitled to a place in that honorable company, though not one of them knew any thing of a law of change sufficiently potent to transmute Negroes into Caucasians, or black men into white men.

Finally, with respect to this law, let every individual decide for himself, according to the testimony of his own experience and observation; and let every one decide for himself upon the following points: Has it ever been known that a white man has turned black, or a black man white, merely from external agencies? Were not the copper colored Indians indigenous to this climate? Were they not supplanted by our ancestors, centuries ago? Are we losing the European and acquiring the aboriginal complexion? Have not the Negroes been resident here for centuries? Are they assimilating to the color of the Indians or ourselves? Upon all these points, the humblest individual is quite as well qualified to decide as are Reese and Dr. Goode.

My friend says, "I have shown, by indisputable historical testimony, that the Egyptians were descendants of the Ethiopians." Again, "Egypt was a colony from Ethiopia." We will inform him, that his testimony is disputable; it is even inadmissible, for we have yet to learn that the authority of Rotteck, of Herodotus, or of any one else, is superior to that of the Scriptures.

Two thousand three hundred and forty-nine years before Christ, Noah, with his sons—Shem, the type of the Hebrews, and undoubtedly Caucasian; Ham, the twin brother of the former, and of course Caucasian likewise; Japheth, the type of the Europeans, and also Caucasian—descended from the Ark upon the top of Ararat. Now, from this time until Abraham went down to Egypt, there is a period of about 330 years; and Abraham found the Egyptians with an established form of civil government, with houses, and with various kinds of domestic animals, which proves that the country even then was thickly inhabited. Let any one take a map and measure the distance from the top of Ararat, southward, through Asia, over rivers, mountains, and deserts, to the Red Sea, into the interior parts of Africa; (and let my friend remember, that in a former article he gave this locality to Ethiopia, and thence saw fit to transport a million of men, with a great company of horses and chariots, to fight with king Asa, whom he erroneously stated to be the great-grandfather of king Solomon;) thence up the Nile into Egypt, considering likewise that the people must have remained in Ethiopia long enough to be transmuted into Negroes, and let him decide for himself whether, without overturning Scripture, such a hypothesis can possibly be correct. Let us look at this again. Four persons, with their families, are the sole inhabitants of the earth. They increase and multiply by the natural course of events. They take possession of new districts as the old become filled. They peacefully emigrate into new territories. There are no political convulsions to accelerate their progress; but rivers, without bridges, are to be crossed; mountains, without gaps, and hideous deserts, without pasturage, food, or water, are to be outflanked. The Red Sea must be crossed without vessels, for the Arabian coast affords no timber with which they could be built, even had there been artificers to accomplish such a work. The desert coast of Africa, which even now is for hundreds of miles almost impregnable, is to be penetrated into; their wives, their little ones, and their flocks, are with them; and such company must necessarily retard their progress. Arrived in Ethiopia, they form a permanent settlement, and before the influences of climate the work of transmutation begins. Three centuries have the Gypsies been in Europe; as yet they manifest no symptoms of change. Three centuries have the Europeans inhabited America; as yet they manifest no symptoms of change. Three centuries have Negroes inhabited both countries; as yet they exhibit no symptoms of change. But these people, before the influences of climate, are changed into Negroes. They increase; they fill Ethiopia; ascend the Nile, and populate Egypt; and the whole is accomplished between Noah and Abraham. If they were Negroes from the first, it was not climate that produced the change; and if they were not Negroes, then they must have remained a sufficient length of time for the transmutation to have been effected; but in either case the difficulties of the journey, and the moral impossibility of its accomplishment in that length of time, would have been the same.

The fact is, Egypt was colonized from Assyria. From the plains of Mesopotamia the patriarchal grandchildren entered by the most direct route—the Isthmus of Suez. Abraham, following in their steps, went down to Egypt. Subsequently we find the Ishmaelitish merchants pursuing the same course; then the sons of Jacob, and finally Jacob himself. This, I assume, was, and had always been, the medium of communication between Assyria and Egypt. Let my reader turn to the 13th chapter of Exodus, 17th and 18th verses: "And it came to pass, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near; for God said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and return to Egypt; but God led the people about through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea." This quotation is full of instruction, as it proves, in the first place, that the direct route was by the way of the Isthmus; and, in the second place, that the lower parts of Egypt were inhabited for a long period of time.

THE CARELESS WORD.

BY THE HON. MRS. MORTON.

A word is ringing through my brain;
It was not meant to give me pain;
It had no tone to bid it stay,
When other things had passed away;
It had no meaning more than all
Which in an idle hour fall;
It was, when first the sound I heard,
A lightly-uttered, careless word.

It was the first, the only one
Of those which lips for ever gone
Breathed in their love—which had for me
Rebuke of harshness at my glee;
And if those lips were here to say,
"Beloved, let it pass away,"
Ah! then, perchance—but I have heard
The last dear tone—the careless word.

Oh! ye who, meeting, sigh to part,
Whose words are treasures to some heart,
Deal gently, ere the dark days come,
When earth hath but for ONE a home;
Lest, musing o'er the past like me,
They feel their hearts wrung bitterly,
And, heeding not what else they heard,
Dwell weeping on a careless word.

OUR FOREIGN MISSION.

The following, from Bro. Carpenter, will be read with interest, as showing somewhat the present condition of affairs connected with our mission in China. It was received by the ship Oneida, and is the latest intelligence in possession of the Board.

SHANGHAI, Nov. 19, 1850.

To the Executive Board of the S. D. B. Missionary Society :—

DEAR BRETHREN,—We have not much at present to report, but wish to keep you informed of our labors, &c., as promptly as possible. And when we have but little to say, it may be the sooner said. In fact, we feel that in our present circumstances, our labors must be principally with our books. And a few weeks of toil upon the rugged path of the Chinese language and literature, gives so little appreciable progress, that it is hardly worth while to speak of it. Besides, if we should attempt a minute report of our progress in the Chinese language, it might prove less edifying than silence. Suffice it to say, on this head, that the new translation of the Scriptures, and the Chinese classics, constitute our daily study, and that our health is improved by the cold weather. The new translation is concise in its style, almost as much so as the classics themselves, which require a commentary. The Scriptures, whether written in a concise or diffuse style, would require a commentary to make them easily intelligible to the Chinese.

I send the Board a copy of a small Catechism which I have recently got out, together with a translation. Fifteen hundred copies, including the blocks, cost nineteen dollars.

Since the reception of our bell, which we have placed upon the top of the house, our congregations have been a little improved. But the Chinese are too indifferent in regard to the Bible to take much pains to go to hear it explained and enforced. We are beginning to look forward in earnest to the time when we can have preaching more frequently, and in a location where we may secure larger congregations. We have got a deed of the chapel lot, and it has the seal of the highest Chinese officer in the city, (the Tautai,) and is now at the office of the U. S. Consul, to be recorded there. We shall hereafter pay tribute to the Emperor, we know not yet how much. The lot has been the property of a mandarin family, and from time immemorial has paid no tribute. But we suppose it will be less than a dollar a year, probably about half a dollar. The lot is to be cleared of its occupants and delivered to us about the middle of March, 1851. We have paid one hundred dollars to bind the bargain. About the first of January we are to make up one half of the purchase money, and the remainder when the lot is delivered over to us. The whole cost is to be one thousand thousand cash, which is about $680. The miserable custom of having go-betweens had nearly thrown us out of this lot. The go-between had represented to us that the owners would not take 1,000,000 cash, and had represented to them that we would not give over $450, or at most $500. He was counting largely for himself. But by waiting a little, we found that the owners were willing to sell for 1,000,000 cash. So we sought an interview with them, made the bargain, and drew the writings, to the no small disturbance of the feelings of the go-between, who, by seeking too much, and in a dishonest way, lost the little that would have been cheerfully given him by the owners, according to custom.

The lot is small, but we think will do very well. The length of the Chapel, that is, the length of the ridge-pole, cannot be more than 30 or 32 feet, but it may be wider than it is long. We think 30 by 36 or 40 feet will be large enough. And as we must, in this low, level country, get up from the ground to live, we are at present in favor of the plan of doing off the upper part for a dwelling. In that case, there would be room enough on the lot for such other out-houses as a small family would require. We are more and more in favor of the plan of having our dwellings connected with our chapels. And if you send us the amount of funds specified in your recent letters as the amount which you were attempting to raise, viz., $3,500, unless advised differently, we intend to see how far it will go towards giving each of us a chapel and dwelling-house.

We have now two Chinese teachers, who, so far as we are able to judge, bid fair to become able expounders of the Word. They have both made several efforts, and from these, as well as from their known qualities, we hope for the future. According to this expectation, if we all live, here will be four of us, and we expect others from home, to expound the word of life in this city. And shall we not need two chapels?

There is a lot, perhaps three-fourths of a mile from the one we have bought, outside of the little south gate, and on a street which always seems to be thronged, which can be bought, we think, for four or five hundred dollars. Bro. W. is desirous to secure it. Both of these lots have some materials on them which could be used in building anew. There is a lot about a quarter of a mile from the one we have bought, which Bro. W. had his eye on, and wrote about, but it has recently been purchased by a member of the Presbyterian Mission at Ningpo, who has recently removed to Shanghai. There was another near the great south gate, which he thought well of, but that has been purchased by a Chinese. Other missionaries are looking for lots, and before long the best locations will be secured. We do not expect to purchase another lot before we hear something from the Board touching the point. The plan of having each of us a chapel has been in our hearts and letters so long, that we expect, before long, to hear what the Board have to say about it. The money which we now pay for the use of this house, would of itself, in a few years, amount to enough to build a house. May the great Head of the Church direct us in all things, and grant that we, together with our beloved brethren at home, and a great company of these now blind heathen, may be presented before his throne with exceeding joy.

Truly yours, S. CARPENTER.

I GOT AGOING, AND COULDN'T STOP.

A little boy named Frank, was standing in the yard, when his father called him:

"Frank!"

"Sir?" said Frank, and started full speed, and ran into the street. His father called him back, and asked him if he did not hear his first call. "Yes, sir," answered Frank.

"Well, then," said his father, "what made you run out into the street?"

"O," said Frank, "I got agoing, and couldn't stop."

This is the way that a great many boys get into difficulty; they get agoing and can't stop. The boy that tells lies, began first to stretch the truth a little—to tell a large story, or to relate an anecdote with a very little variation, till he got agoing, and couldn't stop, till he came out a full grown liar.

The boy that was brought before the police, and sent to the House of Correction for stealing, began by taking little things from his mother—by stealing sweetmeats and other nice things that were put away. Next he began to take things from his companions at school. He got agoing, and could not stop, till he got into jail.

Those two boys that you see fighting out on the green, began by bantering each other, in fun. At length they began to get angry, and dispute, and call each other hard names, till they got agoing, in dispute, and couldn't stop. They will separate with black eyes and bloody noses.

There is a young man, sitting late with his companions at the gaming-table. He has flushed cheeks, an anxious look, a despairing countenance. He has lost his last dollar. He began playing marbles in the street; but he got agoing and couldn't stop.

See that young man, with a dark lantern, stealing from his master's drawer. He is a merchant's clerk. He came from the country a promising boy. But the rest of the clerks went to the theater, and he thought he must go too. He began, thinking he would go only once, just to have it to say that he had been to the theater. But he got agoing and couldn't stop. He has used up all his wages, and wants more money. He cannot resist the temptation, when he knows there is money in the drawer. He has got agoing—he will stop in the State's Prison.

Hark! do you hear that horrid oath? It comes from the foul mouth of a little boy in the street. He began by saying by-words; but he got agoing and couldn't stop.

Fifty young men, were some years ago, in the habit of meeting together in a room at a public-house, to enjoy themselves in a social hilarity, where the wine cup passed freely round. One of them, as he was going there one evening, began to think there might be danger in the way. He stopped and considered a moment, and then said to himself—"Right about, face!" He turned on his heel, and went back to his room, and was never seen at the public house again. He has become rich; and the first block of buildings which he erected, was built directly in front of the place where he stood when he made that exclamation. Six of the young men followed his example. The remaining forty-four got agoing and couldn't stop, till they landed in the ditch, and most of them in the drunkard's grave.

Beware, then, boys, how you get agoing. Be sure, before you start, that you are in the right way; for, when you are sliding down-hill, it is hard to stop.

LOVE FOR CHILDREN.

Rev. Thomas Binney, in his recent eulogy on the character of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, has referred with much force to his love of children as an indication of a noble heart and a genial nature. We quote the following sensible remarks:—

"Observe, too, his interest in young people; his sympathy with them in their pleasures; his participation of their amusements; his anxiety to see them happy; his readiness to ride or shoot with them in a morning, and to suggest to them words for their charades at night. But his delight in children! This is always the indication of a genial nature—a pure, unworn, and unselfish heart. "Never," says Lavater, "make that man your friend, who hates bread, music, or the laugh of a child." Certainly, to hate any of these would be very bad.

I think I could even explain the philosophy of the first. There may be something of insensibility to the second without amounting to positive dislike, that may not materially affect the character—as in the case of our friend before us; but, if the gleeful, leaping laugh of childhood is distasteful to a man—especially if he hates it, or hates to hear it—believe Lavater, and have nothing to do with him. Depend upon it, he is either thoroughly without a soul, or he has so soiled and blackened it by sin, that the sound issuing from young and innocent lips pierces him to his heart like the constrained remembrance of a forfeited inheritance. You may be sure he has got about him no common guilt. To him, in a worse sense than the poet meant it, the beautiful but melancholy verse applies:

"I remember—I remember
The poplars straight and high;
I used to think their spiry tops
Were close against the sky.
"It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To KNOW I'm farther off from heaven
Than when I was a boy."

Sir Fowell Buxton delighted in children, and they, with their instinctive perception of those that like them, delighted in him. He used to walk with them, and talk to them, and try to turn their attention to God in his works. He was fond of pointing out the skill that was displayed in the packing of a bud, and of drawing other interesting lessons from flowers. On this account, his little nephews and nieces, (bless their young hearts!) when they saw the snowdrops and violets in the early spring, used to welcome them as "Uncle Buxton's Sermons."

PERSONAL PREACHING.

"Sir," said a lady, one fine Sunday, to a clergyman, just after the morning service was concluded, "Sir, I hope that you will never preach that sermon again."

"Why not, madam?" "It was so very personal."

"Indeed! What part of it?" "Oh! that part about worldly-mindedness and covetousness."

"But how could that be personal—the remarks were general enough." "You may not have intended to apply it personally, but the congregation will."

"To whom, madam?" "Why, to me."

The lady and the clergyman parted, but not very cordially, as she could not extort from him a promise "never to preach against worldly-mindedness any more." A week passed over, and, on the Sunday following, the same clergyman preached on the subject of "providing all things honest," &c.; his text occurring in the services of the day, which generally guided him in the selection of his subjects. In this sermon (thought he) there is surely nothing to rouse the feelings of the lady who complained of the former discourse; but on the following morning, as [illegible] fetching his letters from the post-office, he encountered [illegible]

"If you please," said John, touching his hat, "if you please, sir, I can explain all about the hats."

"Explain all about the hats, John! I don't understand you." "Why, sir, the hats as you preached about yesterday."

"The hats that I preached about yesterday?" "Yes; I quite understand you."

"That's more than I can do as to you, John; pray explain yourself." "Why, sir, you see, Misses and me has had a row about the livery hats; and me, sir, and the butler, and the footman, sir, felt quite sure as how Misses had set you to preach to us."

"Well, John, call at my house on your way home."

John did so, and the sermon was produced and read to him. "Yes; that's it, sir."

"Can you read writing, John?" "Yes, sir."

"Well, now look at the outside of that sermon, and you will see that it was written twelve years ago; and the reason it was preached yesterday was, because the text came in the course of the service. I know nothing about your quarrel, and your Misses has not spoken to me since the Sunday before last."

John professed himself satisfied.

"I see, John, that hats will sometimes fit as well as caps; good morning to you."

GAINING THE WORLD—LOSING THE SOUL.—"A man told me," says Mr. Shuck, missionary to China, "he worshiped the god of wealth the first and middle of every month, but he said this had nothing to do with his soul. As to his soul, he did not know what would become of it after death. His concern was how he should become rich." How many there are, who live for the same purpose, with the same carelessness about their souls, that this heathen expressed, only they do not venture to say so!

I do not know, says Leigh Hunt, whether it was Lowth, but it was some bishop, to whom my father one day, in the midst of a warm discussion, being asked "if he knew who he was?" replied, with a bow, "Yes, my lord; dust and ashes."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 10, 1851.

THE SABBATH IN THE FAMILY.

We have several times called attention to the importance of beginning the Sabbath at the proper time, and of having all things in readiness to do so without distraction. As soon as the sacred season has fairly commenced, would it not be well for the father to call his household together, and attend to family worship? It strikes us, that this is a beautiful way of entering upon the duties of the Sabbath. Nothing can be more appropriate than for the whole family then to enter at once into communion with Him who "blessed the seventh day and sanctified it." At the going down of the sixth day's sun, therefore, let all be in readiness. Let the entire household be summoned; children, and servants, and those that sojourn with thee. A song of praise to Him whose preserving care has been enjoyed through all the labors and toils of the week past, would be a very suitable commencement of the exercises. And when the family bow in prayer, after asking God to make the Sabbath a blessing to them collectively, and individually, let them pray for their minister, that he may be filled from the Divine fullness, and be enabled to preach the word on the ensuing morning in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power.

The season of family worship being over, let the different members of the household spend the remainder of the evening in such a way as will best tend to elevate their hearts into communion with God, and prepare them for the opportunities and duties of the coming day. It is the practice in some neighborhoods to hold a prayer meeting. We do not object to this, especially where the people are located compactly together, and can be assembled after a few minutes' walk. But in country places, where they are much scattered, it would rather conflict with the performance of family worship at the opening of the Sabbath, as it would be necessary to be on the way to meeting before that time; or, if family worship were put off till after meeting, the children and younger members of the family, who ought to be present, would be in bed. Besides, if it is at all desirable that the pastor should be present at the prayer meeting, the eve of the Sabbath is the most inconvenient time for him in all the week. We always prefer some other evening, where other things are equal. However, better to hold the prayer meeting then, than to have it neglected altogether; and far better than to have the evening spent in secular pursuits.

Sabbath morning comes. Before breakfast, we think—for why should not the soul be fed before the body?—let the family again be summoned. Let the Holy Book be read; and let every member of the family who can read, have a Bible in his hand, and each read one or two verses by turns, or look on while some one else reads. Again let the family bow before the Most High, and again let them remember their minister, beseeching God that he may be able to come before them with such a message as will do good to the souls of the hearers. Let them earnestly pray that it may be a day of God's power. When they go to the place of worship, let them remember that it is God's house. Let them behave with becoming reverence for Him who fills all heaven and earth with his presence, and who is "greatly to be feared in the assemblies of his saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are round about him." When they return home, let them still remember that the Sabbath is to be called a "delight" by all good people, and that they are not to do their own ways, nor find their own pleasure, nor even to speak their own words. Isa. 58: 13. Religious instruction to the children ought by all means to constitute a part of the exercises of the day.

When the Sabbath sun goes down, let the family be assembled again, and again let thanksgiving and praise go up from the family altar, together with supplication that the God of all grace will still preside over the household, and supply all their need, till their time on earth shall be no more, and they shall be prepared for the everlasting Sabbath reserved for the people of God. Reader, try this method of spending the holy Sabbath, and see if it is not attended with profit to yourself and your family.

INTERMINABLE PUNISHMENT.

I should like to be informed (if consistent) when and where the doctrine of interminable punishment was first preached. A satisfactory answer would ease my mind very much. AN INQUIRER AFTER TRUTH.

Reply.

"Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, saying, Behold! the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." Jude 14: 15.

As Enoch preached a judgment to come, the fair presumption is, that he preached the same doctrine concerning the nature and duration of the punishment of the wicked, which is set forth in other parts of the Sacred Volume. Others may have preached it before, but their sermons seem not to have been left upon record. We do not know at what time of life, exactly, Enoch began to preach this doctrine; but he was born in the year of the world 622, "and all the days of Enoch were three hundred and sixty-five years." Allowing him to have attained a pretty good age and considerable experience before he began, we should date the commencement of his preaching career somewhere about the year 700, more than 3000 years before the coming of Christ. Where he exercised his ministry we are not so well informed.

If our correspondent desires to know what are our views concerning the teachings of Scripture on this important question, we refer him to a series of editorial articles, published in this paper last fall, upon the "Destiny of the Wicked."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 33.

GLASGOW, March 21st, 1851.

In the House of Commons, two days ago, the Metropolis Sunday Trading Bill was read a second time and committed, few having spoken either for or against it. Mr. B. Wall, according to notice, moved that it be read that day six months—a form of motion equivalent to that of its rejection. He was, however, induced to withdraw this amendment, on its being acknowledged by the supporter of the Bill, that it would have to be greatly altered in Committee to render it tolerable. It was objected to the measure entirely that its operation should be confined to London; for that, if its provisions would benefit the metropolis, the country at large equally require them. There seemed, however, to the promoters, to be more hope of passing such a limited act than one of a more general character. But by the time it comes from Committee, it is probable that it will be much weakened, although confessedly far from stringent as it now is.

At the Half-Yearly Meeting of the Shareholders of the North British Railway, held yesterday in Edinburgh, a motion by Mr. Blackadder, that they should discontinue passenger and goods Sunday Trains, and limit the Sunday traffic to the Mail Trains, including passenger carriages, was negatived by a considerable majority.

The discussion in Parliament on the Papal Aggression Bill, which was expected to close, allowing it to pass into Committee, was again adjourned. Much important instruction regarding Papal intrigue has been elicited in the debate. It now also appears, that the appointment of Wiseman as Archbishop of Westminster was made above three years ago, having been indirectly mentioned in the Papal official organ, the Roman Gazette, of that date, and now quoted by the Times' correspondent at Rome. The infallible Pope seems to have been long in doubt whether it would be quite safe to launch his Bull against our John Bull, but determined on doing so at length. Meanwhile, our courts have been occupied with a case, in which a Popish surgeon, a Popish priest, and a Popish lawyer, had got an old man, a Frenchman, but long resident in England, to leave £7,000 to the Church while on his death-bed. After a number of days pleading, present discussion has terminated by the money being to be paid over to the Accountant General, until its proper disposal shall be determined in a subsequent action. So far as can be presently judged, it seems to have been a very aggravated case, and has come to light rather inopportunely. Another case has been brought by petition before Parliament, in which a young lady, still a minor, but entitled to a fortune of £80,000 when she attains her majority, has been put by her guardians, (a Roman Catholic nobleman and his lady,) into a nunnery, and the arrangements in whose case have been so formed that the whole sum will fall into the hands of the priesthood within three months after the young lady shall have become entitled to receive it. The petition of her step-father is, that the Legislature may take steps to prevent such things from taking place, and to afford opportunity for relations to visit those so imprisoned. Farther to correct such proceedings, Mr. Lacy and Mr. Spooner have brought a Bill into the House of Commons, "to prevent the forcible detention of females in Religious Houses." This provision has been urged at many of the public meetings which have lately been held relative to the Papacy throughout. One of the largest of these took place in this city two nights ago. It is worth notice, that the two sons of the late Sir Robert Peel, now members of Parliament, have adopted different views on the Papal question. The present Sir Robert has taken a decided part against the aggression.

In the midst of the country's deep interest on this question, regarded as vitally affecting our future liberty and well-being. The Cardinal, so called, had an Address read in the beginning of the month to his beloved people in their several chapels in London. Relative to the agitation, he urged prayer for their opposers, and promised "indulgence" to those who should do so in the way and in the places he prescribes. And speaking of the coming Exhibition in London, and its dangers, he urges his people to provide themselves, by laying up, beforehand, blessing and grace, in abundant store, to avert or mitigate these evils, concluding by granting dispensations for Lent, 1851:—

1. Flesh meat is allowed on all Sundays, and once usually on three other days of the week.

2. Eggs allowed at a single meal to some, and at the discretion of others, (with specified exceptions.)

3. Cheese allowed—under the same restrictions.

4. "The use of dripping or lard is permitted at dinner and collation on all days"—also under restriction.

5. No allowance of flesh and fish at the same meal.

All this buffoonery, in the name of God, and in the face of instructed England!! Strange that any human being should allow himself to imagine that a gift of "red stockings," by even Peter's successors, entitles him to regulate the use of kitchen "dripping!" But so it seems it is.

A dreadful catastrophe has occurred in this immediate neighborhood, an explosion having taken place in a coal pit at Nitshill, when 63 persons were below in the workings. Two persons only have been got out alive. Forty-six years ago an explosion took place in the Hurlet pit, adjoining, when 30 lives were lost. J. A. BEGG.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 5.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

Leave Metearis—Monkey Shot—Thunder Storm—Town of Managua—Scene on the Lake—Expelled from the Church—Ancient Sculpture—An Evening at Doctor Rivas' House—Volcanic Eruption—Nindari—Indian Customs.

After a repast on eggs and fruit, we resumed our way, diversified by hill and valley, wilder and more romantic than any thing we had yet seen. Thus far from Rialejo the soil was every where well adapted to cultivation, and free from rock; but this day we passed many volcanic masses, and the road in many places was cut through beds of ash-colored lava. Monkeys were numerous, and one of them was shot. It was a large black one, with a white face; and though the ball had passed through his heart, there was such a look of humanity in the pale dead face, that it called forth a general expression of condemnation at the deed, as a crime nearly allied to murder. We crossed high ground, which was called "the Volcano," but for what reason I could not learn; whether it was the base of a mountain or not, I could not tell, so deeply were we buried in the forest.

About the middle of the afternoon we heard the rumble of distant thunder, and masses of dark clouds were shutting in the little strips of sky over head. I was unwilling to get wet, and spurred on ahead of the guide. He too looked squally, and grumbled "poco tiempo." I pointed to the clouds, and hurried the faster. At length I reached the crest of the hill, where was a fruit station. As I rode past, they too cried "poco tiempo," but I had got clear of the guide, and meant to keep him at a distance. He never passed a place where there was an excuse for stopping, without doing so; but he feared the loss of his horse, and on he came, as fast as his steed could carry him. At length I came to a descent so difficult that I was compelled to dismount and lead my horse. This continued for a quarter of a mile, and is the only difficult part of the route for wheel vehicles. In the mean time the rain and the guide were inevitable. At the foot of the hill was another ranch for the accommodation of travelers, and a domesticated monkey, that afterwards became one of our traveling party. It was said that the parting between it and the old woman who had reared it, was very affecting.

A short ride over a plain brought us to Managua, an old and important town. We were met on the way by Senior Bruno, who conducted us to his hospitable inn, where we were made to feel the unbounded generosity of the old Castilian blood. Managua is on the lake of that name; and, as soon as I had satisfied the cravings of appetite, I went out to see what might be of interest in the town. Standing on the shore of the lake, when the trees on its margin threw long shadows over its surface, how much I longed for the power to convey a correct impression of the interesting scene, combining all that is picturesque in nature with the innocent simplicity of a people but little advanced from the pastoral state. Hundreds of women were gathering up the clothing which had been washed in the lake, or frolicking in their evening bath. It seemed that all the younger portion of the inhabitants were carrying water, for there was an uninterrupted file of them, bearing round bottles of it, holding from two to four gallons, on their heads. It is in this way that all the water used in town is carried from the lake. I saw a group of girls "hulling corn," or preparing it to make "hommony." Large wooden bowls were used, and having soaked the corn for a short time in ashes and water, they get in with bare feet and tread, changing the water from time to time, until the whole looked white and delicious.

We next went to the Cathedral, an old, rude, but imposing edifice; but—whether from our highwayman, heretical, or irreverent looks, must remain with me a subject of speculation—there were certain significant gestures, that in the natural language of all men have a very definite signification, and which served to lead my mind toward the door. I knew but little of the Spanish tongue, but sufficient to satisfy myself that the word "vamos" was more rudely applied than I had known before; and I left, none the better impressed for all the piety displayed in their solemn old rookery. Buzzards were perching on the turrets in great numbers, and an old buzzard spirit, who ruled inside, told me, as I was going out, that for one rial I might go through the church!

Returning to the inn, I passed a rude statue on the corner of one of the streets, which I recognized at once as one of the same origin as those represented in Stevens' work on Central America. It produced a thrilling emotion to look upon one of those mysterious relics of an unknown age and power. I wished to know where it had been found, and summoning all my Spanish to the undertaking, I approached a group who were standing in a door opposite, looking with as great curiosity at me. What I said to them I never knew, but it only raised a shout of laughter at my expense, and I returned to renew my inspection of the figure, in no better humor at having contributed to their amusement.

When I reached the inn, I found an invitation from Doctor Rivas, a native of the town, to spend the evening at his house. He was a young man, educated at Guatemala, which he termed the Paris of Central America, and his library was well supplied with books in the German, Spanish, French, and Latin; but of English he knew nothing. He manifested the warmest interest in Americans, and spared no pains to please us. His uncle, an old priest, swung in a hammock all the evening, without speaking to any one; but his two sisters were very social, and talked Spanish, sang, danced, smoked cigars, and spit fluently; but from the Doctor I learned much by the use of the Latin, in speaking which he was proficient, and which required all the aids I could make use of to enable me to follow him. The statue which had attracted my notice, he said, was taken from an old ruin at the foot of the steep hill I had passed in the afternoon. This ruin he represented as being very large, and only partially explored. There were many others on the islets in the lake. He proposed to me to remain with him and visit these places, but my horse must go on with the company. I would recommend to any one traveling through this country to own his own horse, and then stop a few days at this place, and also at Massaya, where we arrived the next day. Nothing could have given me more pleasure, except seeing home, than a few weeks research in this interesting region. From the dense nature of the forests, the country is almost unexplored, and what monuments of the greatest importance to the history of this continent and our race, are now lying concealed by the dense thickets on the shores of these beautiful lakes! How had my boyish imagination been fired to explore these hidden mysteries, when thousands of miles away, and I had not the most distant hope of ever seeing the country in which they were said to exist. I was now in their very midst, and about to leave without giving a single day to the search; but time and hardships had tempered my archeological fervor, and long wandering had made me weary of it. Of our late Consul, Mr. Squires, the Doctor spoke with warmth, as a man who had the entire confidence of his people, and he hoped he would soon be returned to them. To the people of the North American States they looked as to brothers, and he hoped the time was not distant when Nicaragua would be one of the Confederation—when our citizens would settle in their fertile, beautiful country, and their waste places be made to blossom like the rose. He believed there were many bad men amongst us, but he had great confidence in the lofty, generous spirit of the great American people.

It was late when I returned to the hotel; the hammock which I had bespoken was occupied, and the doctor sent me the one I saw hanging in his house. This was too long for the room at the inn, and I suspended it in the portico, and was roused early by an attempt, on the part of an ass—they said it was a mule, but I could not see how it was possible—to let me down by eating the strings.

We set out after breakfast, making our "adios" to our friends of the evening before, and left our worthy host with a letter of commendation to those who were following with the caritas. The doctor gave me a note to Justo Lugo, of the "Spanish Hotel" at Granada, and we plunged again into the forest. The road ascended gradually until we reached an elevation of several hundred feet, after a sharp ride of two or three hours. Here the crest of the hill was free from trees, and an extensive view was furnished of the large extent of country lying between the two lakes, buried in the dark green of primeval forest. Not a sight or sound of life was there in all that vast space. In the rear was the lake of Managua. As yet not a sail spots its surface, and man leaves uncontested the dominion of the forests to beasts and reptiles. A few miles further brought us unexpectedly to an abrupt termination of all vegetation, and one of the most interesting points in our journey. Near the very spot where the road crossed, was a fountain, from which had flowed a vast quantity of black lava, and its course could be tracked for miles down the hills, where it had destroyed every thing in its course, and appeared in the distance like the black loam of a swamp, just turned up by the plow; but nearer to us the scene was wild and rugged in the extreme. As the supply of lava diminished, and the surface hardened, the softer parts continued to flow down, leaving a crust, which, having nothing to support it, tumbled in and left the rocks as though they had been heaved up on the spot where they lay. A large tree had been overthrown close by, the lava had formed a shell around it, and as the tree was consumed, a hollow cylinder remained, with the impression of the bark perfectly distinct on the inner surface. One can hardly fail to notice it in passing. It is said that ninety years have elapsed since the eruption, and the lava of previous eruptions has formed a deep soil, overgrown by a dense wood to the very edge of the recent deposit; yet those ninety years have not decomposed the volcanic mass sufficiently to give support to lichens or moss, but they are as black and hard as though it was the work of yesterday.

A short distance brought us in view of the volcano of Massaya on our right, and the distant waters of the great lake of Nicaragua on our left. Descending once more to the plain, the country exhibited more evidences of improvement than I had yet seen. Groves of plantains, and fields of corn in every stage of growth, announced our approach to another town not on our list. Stevens, when passing through this country, barely alluded to it as the town of Nindari. But never did my eyes rest upon a picture more captivating to the senses. It was a long mile that we rode through its principal street, and halted for the loiterers to join us. No one came out to sell us fruit, or salute us, as in other towns. It is called an Indian village, and I had regarded the most of them as but little else; for though in the larger ones there is more or less admixture of Spanish blood, the great mass of the population is pure Indian. But here they had retained all their primitive customs, except that they had adopted the language and religion of their conquerors. The town was laid out into squares, separated by streets, and subdivided by hedge-rows into smaller squares, in the center of each of which was a neat thatch cottage, and around the sides groves of plantains or bananas; orange trees, loaded with fruit, were thickly interspersed, and high above all the rest the cocoa raised its ponderous fruit and nodded tauntingly to the thirsty traveler. These enclosures are perfectly neat; not a dead leaf is allowed to remain, and the whole town resembled a carefully-kept botanical garden more than the abode of thousands of human beings. A stone church, and an enclosure for a bull fight, to take place that week, is all that would remind us that the Spaniard had been there and planted his faith and vices. While in Peru Mr. Falls presented me with a collection of domestic and other utensils, which he had exhumed at Arica from an old burial place used before the conquest of Pizarro; among them were earthen pitchers, pots, bottles, &c., resembling those now used by the people here in texture and form; but the art of coloring pottery, used by the ancient Peruvians, is not now known by either people. The corn is ground by being rubbed between two stones—one flat and a little concave, the other like a rolling-pin. These stones are wrought with great care, and are transmitted as heir-looms, like their little homesteads, from generation to generation. In two instances I inquired when they were made, but the answer was, "Quen sabe?" "Who knows?"

REVIVAL IN SHILOH, N. J.

Deacon Bright, of Shiloh, N. J., writes of quite an interesting state of things in that place. The series of meetings which followed the dedication of their new house of worship, "were profitable and well attended, and resulted in reviving the church to some degree, so that there was more of an awakening than there had been for a number of years before, though more of it is needed yet. The church was apparently struggling more earnestly in prayer than it had done for a long time. Truly, Zion did travail, and brought forth children; and young children they were, for the most part. The youth of the congregation seem to be coming out in advance of the old people. Some forty have been forward for prayers during the course of the meetings, (though not that number at once,) and nearly all quite young. We have been to the water side four times, and seen eighteen submit to the ordinance of baptism. In the Marlboro church ten have been baptized. Last night (March 29th) eleven came forward for prayer, and some of them are looked for next Sabbath. The greatest interruption which we have had to our meetings, was a great fall of snow, and rain so often that it seemed as if all was going to fall this month. On the Sabbath, however, the house was well filled in spite of the snow and bad traveling. At present, the meetings are not so well attended, nor are they held so frequently, the farmers being now hurried with their spring work. Elder Jones is remarkably industrious and useful in his calling."

REVIVAL IN WISCONSIN.—A business letter from Charles A. Burdick, dated Christiana, Dane Co., Wisconsin, March 27, says:—"The church here has been blessed with a good degree of revival during the past winter. The members of the church have been aroused to greater activity in the discharge of duty, and sinners have been awakened. Seven have gone forward in the ordinance of baptism, six of whom were added to the church. Six have also been added by letter. May the Lord still pour out his Spirit, and the stream of salvation flow until the entire earth shall be irrigated with its saving influence."

THE CLARENCE CHURCH.—The Seventh-day Baptist Church at Clarence, N. Y., has been for a long time in a destitute and scattered condition. But we are glad to learn, by a letter from Bro. L. M. Cottrell, a colporteur of the American Sabbath Tract Society, that a series of meetings has recently been held at a place within the bounds of the Clarence Church, which has resulted in awakening many members to a sense of their duty, and leading some sinners to inquire what they shall do to be saved. Some ten or twelve have openly professed Christ.

THE GERMAN SABBATH-KEEPERS OF PENNSYLVANIA.—A letter from Abram Burger, of Snowhill, Pa., informs us that the recent application of the German Seventh-day Baptists to the Legislature of Pennsylvania for exemption from the penalties of the Sunday Law, was not successful. He says, however, that since last spring the Sabbath-keepers have not been disturbed in their labors on the first day of the week, and they pursue them on that day as on the other working days.

THOUGHTS ON THE SABBATH, AND THE PERPETUITY OF THE LAW OF GOD, BY J. N. ANDREWS, is the title of a pamphlet of some thirty pages, recently sent us. We have looked through it, and find it to be a very good argument for the Sabbath of the Bible, and particularly well adapted to meet the antinomian form of argument which is becoming so general at the present day. We commend it to the perusal of those who are honestly inquiring after truth.

REVIVALS IN COLLEGES.—The last Thursday in February was very extensively observed as a day of prayer for colleges. On that very day, as we learn from a Boston paper, a religious revival of great power commenced in Williams College, Mass. In the Genesee College, a Methodist Institution, which has recently gone into operation at Lima, N. Y., a very interesting and extensive revival is said to be in progress. The Genesee Evangelist says:—

"The ordinary exercises of the school are all kept up regularly. The chapel is opened evenings for public prayer, and the students spontaneously crowd in; and scores are anxious to testify of God's converting grace, and scores more are penitently seeking his face and favor. A recitation room is open for a single hour, when one or more of the teachers meet inquirers, and from fifty to seventy-five daily come in to be instructed in matters that appertain to their souls' salvation. Students also gather in clusters at their private rooms, and pray for and exhort one another."

REVIVALS IN CONNECTICUT.—A correspondent of the Independent says that "besides a number of revivals among the Methodists in several towns in this State, there have been, during the past winter, or are at present, very refreshing times among the Congregationalists in a good many places. Twenty-five or thirty have appeared to set out in the way to Zion at Stamford, in the congregation of Rev. Isaac Jennings. Fifty or more, in the congregation to which Rev. Mr. Haight is ministering in South Norwalk, are thought to give evidence of conversion; and there is considerable seriousness in Dr. Hall's Society, the first church of Norwalk. In Harwinton there has been a powerful revival in progress for two or three months, under the untiring labors of the pastor, Rev. Mr. Jones. It is said that a hundred are thought to be the subjects of a work of grace. Some twenty-five or thirty are reported to have indulged hope in New Britain; and a hundred in Plainville. Considerable seriousness is said to exist in New Hartford, and also in Norfolk. A good work has recently commenced in Winsted, in connection with a series of evening meetings."

WORK FOR PHILANTHROPISTS.—The English Churchman, on the authority of the clergy of Bethnal Green, London, states that "there are 14,000 children, from 4 to 14 years of age, in that parish, without any education whatever, in consequence of the extreme poverty of their parents."

The Committee of the London Diocesan Board of Education, in the Report of July, 1850, state that the number of juvenile delinquents, under 15 years of age, approaches to 5,000 annually; and that there are 50,000 children wandering in the streets—untaught in religion and morality—and crying, "I perish with hunger!"

Lord Ashley stated in the House of Commons, in June, 1848, "that there were 30,000 naked, filthy, deserted, roaming, lawless children, who formed the seed plot of 19-20ths of the crime which desolates the metropolis. At a public meeting on July 13th, 1849, his lordship most confidently declared it to be his opinion, "that 99 cases out of every 100 were the result of the want of honest occupation."

BEQUESTS TO CHARITY.—The Boston Post says that Abiel Chandler, who died on the 22d ult. at Walpole, N. H., has left by will $50,000 to Dartmouth College, to establish a school of instruction in the practical and useful arts of life. He has also given $1,600 to the New Hampshire Asylum for the Insane, and made many devises and bequests to his relatives and friends. The New Hampshire Asylum for the Insane is made residuary legatee. Mr. C. was a native of Concord, N. H.; fitted for college at Exeter Academy; graduated at Harvard College in 1806. He was a most estimable man, and his life was full of unostentatious charities.

The Boston Journal says that Mr. James Ingersoll, whose sudden death was recently recorded, has left by his will property to the amount of about $90,000; and that the sum of $20,000 is bestowed on various charitable and religious societies.

SUICIDE OF A MISSIONARY.—A very sad case of suicide from temporary insanity is that of Rev. James G. Bridgman, who went to China in 1844. He was a cousin of Dr. Bridgman, and was subsequently appointed an assistant missionary. Some two or three years ago he received ordination at Canton. He was unmarried, and lived by himself. His health became impaired, and his devotion to study was beyond his physical ability. Insanity supervened, during which he inflicted a wound which terminated his life.

A FEMALE MISSIONARY.—A letter from Mr. Danforth, of the Assam Mission, says that he recently made a trip of a week in company with his wife, during which they visited many villages and distributed some five hundred books. "Most of these people had never seen a 'mem-sahib,' before, and were greatly surprised that a queen, as they called her, should condescend to visit them, who were the lowest and vilest of the earth. Crowds flocked around and listened with deep attention to her instructions."

DEATH OF AN EPISCOPAL CLERGYMAN.—Rev. Samuel F. Jarvis, D.D., LL.D., died at his residence in Middletown, Ct., on the 25th of March, in the 65th year of his age. He had been appointed by the Episcopal General Convention] "Historiographer of the Church," and was engaged in preparing an Ecclesiastical History extending from the times of the Apostles to the organization of the church in this country.

General Intelligence.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

By the U. S. Mail Steamer Baltic, which arrived at New York on the evening of the 3d inst., in twelve days from Liverpool, we have European dates to March 22d. The Baltic left New York on Wednesday, and returned on Thursday, four weeks after. She made the passage out in 11 days and 17 hours, encountering strong easterly winds and a rough sea. She spent five days in discharging and taking in cargo and coals, and returned as above, having twice crossed the ocean in less than a month.

Another Fugitive Case in Boston.

On Fifth-day night last, a colored man named Thomas Sims was arrested in Boston, charged with being the slave of James Potter, rice planter, living in Chatham, Georgia, from whom he escaped on the 22d of February last. The case came before Commissioner Curtis on Sixth-day, when several persons testified to having known Sims in Savannah as the slave of Potter. At the request of defendant's counsel, the case was adjourned twenty-four hours, and came up again on Sabbath, when the captain, mate, and a sailor, of the brig M. & J. C. Gilmore, were examined, and testified that they saw Sims on the wharf at Savannah a few days before sailing; that he asked the cook for a situation and was refused; that when off Boston Light the prisoner was found by the mate, hid in the forecastle; that he was confined in the vessel by the captain while in the harbor, but managed to escape on shore at South Boston, by forcing the lock off the cabin, and taking the brig's boat; that he told them he came on board the brig at Savannah, the night before they sailed. This closed the evidence for the claimant.

Counsel for the defense then announced that they had no evidence to offer. An affidavit of the Fugitive was read, stating that his freedom was purchased by his father when he was five months old; that his free papers are now in the possession of Morris Potter, of Savannah, and that he desires delay to obtain them; that he never heard of James Potter, his alledged master, until yesterday morning. No notice was taken of this paper.

Mr. Rantoul then announced that he designed to argue the constitutionality of this law as to the right of a Commissioner to sit upon the case, trial by jury, &c., and asked a postponement until Thursday. The Court would only grant till Monday at 12 o'clock.

The Bribery Case in the Senate of New York.

In the Senate of New York, last week, the Committee appointed to investigate the charges of Mr. Suydam, of New-York, against George W. Bull, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and Senators Robinson, Johnston and Stone, reported that "It is clearly established that Mr. Bull did receive money in consideration of his efforts to defeat the passage of a bill for the more effectual suppression of Gambling;" and that, in the opinion of the Committee, he had been guilty of attempting, directly or indirectly, to prevent the passage of the bill in question by influencing the votes of Members; that he is, therefore, "guilty of a breach of the privileges of the Senate, and may be punished for contempt by imprisonment during the Session of the Legislature or otherwise, as the Senate may determine." In regard to the Senators, Messrs. Robinson, Johnston and Stone, the Committee considered that the signing of a note addressed to Mr. Bull at the Astor House, stating that "other business pressing on the time of the Senate, will prevent any report or farther action on the bill," was highly improper in their character of Senators. The Committee add:—"It is clearly testified to, that none of those Senators ever received any money or promise of money, or valuable consideration from Mr. Bull or any other person, by reason of anything they might do or omit to do in relation to the bill introduced by Senator Robinson."

Mr. Bull was of course removed from the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, and after a long debate the following resolution was adopted by the Senate:—

Resolved, That in view of the evidence submitted to the Senate by the Select Committee, Senators Robinson, Johnston and Stone, though they have acted with imprudence, have not forfeited the confidence of the Senate in their honor and integrity as Senators and as men.

Frightful Scenes in Texas.

Major Bartlett, Commissary of the Boundary Commission, arrived at New Orleans from Galveston, March 25th. He brings accounts of some horrible scenes of disorder, riot, murder, and execution, which took place at Socorro about the closing days of January. It seems that bands of armed ruffians, discharged teamsters and soldiers, and frontier desperadoes, have been overawing the quiet inhabitants of Socorro, by parading the streets armed, and committing all manner of lawless acts. They robbed and killed openly, without provocation or remorse. Instances are given of their seizing an unoffending man, taking away his gun, and killing him with it, without the shadow of a cause, and brutally beating the women. Through the 28th and 29th of January, they ranged like wild beasts, committing all sorts of crimes. On the night of the 29th a most audacious outrage was committed. The robber band, seeking a man named Clarke, (E. C. Clarke, said to be the son of J. W. Clarke, U. S. Senator from Rhode Island,) went to a fandango or dancing party where he was, and maltreated the whole party of men and females. They placed sentinels at the entrance, fired off pistols at the candles, and otherwise terrified the women, threatening death to man or woman who should stir, and, finally, the leader, one Alexander Young, assisted by three others, John Wade, Marcus Butler, and William Craig, fell upon Clarke and gave him nine or ten mortal wounds. Another man, named Charles Gates, was badly shot. Next morning some members of the Boundary Commission, who were present in town, resolved to arrest the murderers at all hazards, and sent an express to the main body of the Commission at San Elezario, for help. In three hours a large party of Americans and Mexicans arrived, in such force as to be able to search for and seize eight or ten of the worst—including Wade, Butler and Craig. Young, the ringleader, escaped. These men were brought before Judge Berthold on the 30th January, examined and committed, and the following day they were tried by Jury, sentenced to be hung within one hour, and notwithstanding the threats and preparations of their associates, the sentence was enforced, and they were hung to the branches of a tree on Friday morning. A reward, $400, was offered for the arrest of Young. He was arrested on the 10th, and brought to Socorro on the 11th. He immediately made full confession of his crime, but was nevertheless put on trial on the 12th. His own written confession, which he repeated and signed, was added to the other testimony. He was found guilty, condemned, and executed on the same tree where his companions had been hung.

THE THREE-CENT PIECES.—Preparations are making for a large issue of this coin from the Philadelphia Mint at an early day. By authority of the Treasury Department, a great part of the Silver Bullion fund will be converted into these pieces, and after reserving a sufficient supply for the various Government offices, the balance will be exchanged for deposits of foreign Silver Coins or Bullion, and also for American Gold and Silver Coins. A fund is likewise provided for procuring future supplies of Silver Bullion for this coinage, so that all the public demands may be promptly satisfied. To prevent undue accumulations of these coins in single hands, a discretion is allowed to decline selling more than $150 worth at a time to one applicant. Authority is also given to deliver the coins in distant cities, at the cost of the Mint for transportation, as is now the case in distributing the copper coinage.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—In Alfred, N. Y., on Sixth-day, March 28th, Benj. F. Allen, a son of Dea. Geo. Allen, met with a serious accident from the explosion of the barrel of a gun with which he was shooting pigeons. A piece of the barrel, some four inches and a half in length, was thrown against a rail, and, rebounding, struck him on the left parietal bone, breaking it entirely through, and also making a severe wound farther back on the head. Drs. Collins and Nye dressed the wound, and the patient was doing well at last accounts.

DESTRUCTION OF PIRATES.—The Overland Mail brings accounts of the destruction of a number of pirates by the Dutch among the islands in the Sulo group. In the month of November last, the island of Bawean, on the coast of Java, was attacked by fifteen pirates' prahus, who did much damage, carrying away many of the inhabitants, and a fruitless search for them was made by H. M. steamers Bromo and Hekla at the island of Selombo, and along the whole south coast of Borneo. The Hekla, however, at length fell in with them, and after a great deal of hard fighting, succeeded in killing some and dispersing the remainder. The result of these operations is thus described in the Java Courant: "In the whole the Hekla has brought, beside the large prahu, fourteen pirates, sixty-one rescued slaves, and eight pieces of ordnance, among which is a metal cannon of the former East India Company. The rest of the guns, lying in the mud, and some goods lying on the shore or floating in the water, were given to our allies, the Kangeangers. The loss of the pirates is thought to have been very great. They beside lost all the booty in goods and slaves which they had taken at Bawean and Sapadie. This arduous and successful engagement was unaccompanied by any casuality on the part of our forces."

A NEW DODGE.—We were informed on Saturday, says the N. Y. Tribune, of a new and novel way of "raising the wind." A man called at the house 284 West Twenty-seventh-st., and proceeded to take off the lock of the door. When asked what he was doing, he answered that the owner had sent him to repair the lock, and he was removing it for that purpose. The occupant remonstrated, declaring that the lock was in excellent order, and did not require his tinkering. But the man was firm—he had his instructions and he should do his duty, as required—and he proceeding to strip the locks of the front and rear doors, and depositing them in his basket, he marched off. It was afterward ascertained that the owner knew nothing of the man, but this discovery was made too late. The pretended locksmith was nothing more than a thief who had taken this method to "make a raise."

POOR AND INSANE OF RHODE ISLAND.—Thomas R. Harvard, Esq., commissioner to inquire into the condition of the public poor and insane of Rhode Island, made his report to the Legislature at its late session. In fifteen towns in the State, asylums for the poor are maintained. In sixteen towns not having asylums, the poor are put to persons who will keep them for the lowest sum, or boarded out by contract. The average cost for each individual per annum in the asylum is, $51 50; for each individual per annum, of the latter class, $54 60. The average number of poor supported in asylums is 500; all others 229; total 729. Whole cost of supporting the poor, including interest on cost of asylums, $51,003 23. Insane persons in Rhode Island, 282. Idiots and imbeciles, 136. Blind, 60. Deaf and Dumb, 63.

DIED.

In Petersburg, N. Y., April 3d, 1851, ELECTA HALL, in the eighteenth year of her age. This was the third death in the family of Bro. Hall in the short space of about eighteen months. Electa was a girl of more than usual piety and Christian principle. She lived beloved by all; she died in strong faith, lamented by a large circle of friends. In her death a light of the Church has disappeared, to shine again in a happier clime, where death never finds an entrance. J. S.

In Hayfield, Pa., March 31st, of scarlet fever, E. A. F., son of Eld. A. A. F. and Lucy Randolph, aged two years. Thus within the short space of one year two lovely children have been called from the embrace of these parents to seats prepared above—to the embrace of a heavenly parent. P. C.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Knickerbocker Magazine for 1851.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

IN one of the chapters of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, yet in force, there is a declaration, "That the encouragement of the Arts and the Sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America." It has ever been the highest purpose of the Knickerbocker to elevate the standard of American Literature. It has been the medium of introducing many of our most popular authors to the public. To those who take a pride in sustaining a good American Magazine, entirely national in its character, we look for support. Men of judgment need not be told that it is impossible to get up a Magazine entirely original at the same prices at which those made up from foreign sources are sold. The unremitted efforts of the Editor and Publisher will be continued to improve the work.

SPLENDID PREMIUM TO OLD AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The Publisher, grateful for the large increase of patronage which this old favorite of the reading community has received, since it passed into his hands, has determined to offer to the old patrons, and to all new subscribers, a splendid engraving recently published in this city, by Messrs. Goupil, Vibert & Co., from a painting by a well-known American artist, William S. Mount, Esq. This Print is entitled,

"MUSIC IS CONTAGIOUS."

It is 19 by 24 inches, is printed on beautiful paper, and when framed will make a valuable and elegant ornament for the drawing-room or parlor. The price of the Engraving is three dollars. It will be given to all subscribers to the Knickerbocker Magazine who pay their subscription for 1851 in advance, or during the month of January, 1851, and to all new subscribers who commence with January, 1851, and pay in advance. To entitle subscribers to the Engraving, all payments must be made to the Publisher. Subscribers who owe for more than one year will be expected to settle all arrears and pay for 1851, to entitle them to the Engraving. The bills of specie-paying banks in all parts of the country will be received in payment. The Engraving will be rolled on a stick, and so securely done up, that it can be sent to California, or any other part of the United States, with perfect safety. The number for January, 1851, will commence the thirty-seventh volume of this work.

ST. LEDGER; OR, THE THREADS OF LIFE.

The Publisher has great pleasure in announcing to the readers of the Knickerbocker, and to the public generally, that he has effected an arrangement with Mr. RICHARD B. KIMBALL, the author of this popular and extraordinary Romance, to give the Sequel in the pages of this Magazine. The first chapter appears in the January number, and will be continued regularly until completed. This work has already passed through three editions in this country, and two in England, and has received more favorable notices from the American and English press than any work of fiction which has been issued during the last five years.

TERMS—$5 per annum, in advance. All letters on business must be addressed, post-paid, to Might Makes Right.

A sparrow, perched upon a bough,
Spied a poor beetle creep below,
And picked it up. "Ah, spare me, spare!"
The insect prayed; but vain its prayer.
"Wretch!" cried the murderer, "hold thy tongue,
For thou art weak, and I am strong."

A hawk beheld him, and in haste
Sharpens his beak for a repast,
And pounces plump upon him. "Oh," Exclaims the sparrow, "let me go."
"Wretch!" cried the murderer, "hold thy tongue,
For thou art weak, and I am strong."

The hawk was munching up his prey,
When a stout eagle steer'd that way,
And seized upon him. "Sure, comrade,
You'll spare my life—we're both of a trade!"
"Wretch!" cried the murderer, "hold thy tongue,
For thou art weak, and I am strong."

A sportsman saw the eagle fly,
He shot and brought him from the sky;
The dying bird could only groan,
"Tyrant! what evil have I done?"
"Wretch!" cried the murderer, "hold thy tongue,
For thou art weak, and I am strong."

'T is thus that man to man behaves;
Witness the planter and his slaves.
'T is thus that state oppresses state,
And infant freedom meets its fate.
Naples and Spain must hold their tongue,
For Austria, France and Co. are strong.

A Skirt for Wadding.

The New London Chronicle gives a glowing sketch of the life and patriotic eccentricities of Mrs. Anna Bailey, who recently died at Groton, aged 92. She was one of the heroines of the Revolution, and many amusing anecdotes are told of her. But, says the biographer, the wide notoriety of Mrs. B. is founded on an incident which happened in the summer of 1813. This is the incident:—

The squadron of Commodore Decatur had been chased into New London harbor by a superior British fleet; and an attack upon the town was momentarily expected. It was of great importance that the fort on Groton Heights should be immediately prepared for a vigorous defense. Major Simeon Smith, with a band of volunteers from New London, hastened to the reinforcement of the garrison, and preparations were made to give the enemy a warm reception, when it was discovered that they were short of cartridges. Wadding was wanted, and a messenger was sent in haste through the village to procure flannel.

The inhabitants had mostly packed their goods, and were carrying them off to places less exposed. Mrs. Bailey was sending away her effects, and had only a few necessary articles left in the house. She was crossing the street to a neighbor's door, when the messenger, having traversed the village, asking in vain at every house for flannel to make cartridges, accosted her, and made known his errand and his ill success. Without a moment's delay—quick as thought—she slipped her hand into her pocket-hole, loosened her skirt, shook it off, and lifting it up, presented it to the messenger with a right hearty laugh, expressing a wish, the import of which was, that it might do its work promptly and effectually.

The bystanders were much amused, and uttered a shout of admiration. The messenger hastened with his prize to the fortress, and made his report. The story was rehearsed to the whole garrison, and the sacrificed skirt being unrolled and displayed, was received with loud acclamations; the men, rearing it up on their pikes, declared that they would fight under it to the last drop of their blood. Had the British actually made an attack at that time, it is quite probable that the memorable garment would have been run up the flag-staff, and allowed to throw out its folds upon the wind as a banner.

This anecdote went forthwith into the newspapers, and was soon spread through the Union. Mrs. Bailey was exalted to a pinnacle of notoriety, as the greatest of female patriots. She was toasted, visited, caressed—letters, tokens, and presents, were sent her from all quarters. At a great military and naval ball given in New London not long afterwards, Mrs. Bailey appeared in antique costume, and was led out upon the floor by the officer highest in rank that was present on the occasion. Since that period, strangers stopping at New London have made it a point to visit Mrs. Bailey. Two Presidents of the United States, Monroe and Jackson, in their respective tours through the Northern States, after visiting Groton Fort, went in stately procession to pay their respects to her as the heroine of Groton.

Enemies of the Whale.

In a book called "The Whaleman's Adventures in the Southern Ocean," by Rev. Henry T. Cheever, we find this among other facts gathered by him on the homeward cruise of the Commodore Preble:—

The only natural enemies the whale is known to have, are the sword-fish, thrasher, and killer. This latter is itself a species of whale, that has sharp teeth, and is exceedingly swift in the water, and will bite and worry a whale until quite dead. When one of them gets among a gam, or school of whales, he spreads great consternation, and the timid creatures fly every way, like deer chased by the hounds, and fall an easy prey to whale-boats that may be near enough to avail themselves of the opportunity. I have heard a captain detail, with interest, a scene of this kind, in which the killers and harpooners were together against the poor whale, and the killers actually succeeded in pulling under and making off with a prize which the whalemen thought themselves sure of. In the United States' exploring squadron, on board the Peacock, as we learn from the narrative of Commander Wilkes, they witnessed a sea-fight between a whale and one of these enemies. The sea was quite smooth, and offered the best possible view of the combat. First, at a distance from the ship, a whale was seen floundering in a most extraordinary way, lashing the smooth sea into a perfect foam, and endeavoring, apparently, to extricate himself from some annoyance. As he approached the ship, the struggle continuing, and becoming more violent, it was perceived that a fish about twenty feet long held him by the jaw, his spoutings, contortions, and throes, all betokening the agony of the huge monster. The whale now threw himself at full length upon the water, with open mouth, his pursuer still hanging to his under-jaw, the blood issuing from the wound, dyeing the sea for a long distance round. But all his flounderings were of no avail; his pertinacious enemy still maintained his hold, and was evidently getting the advantage of him. Much alarm seemed to be felt by the many other whales about. These killers are of a brownish color on the back, and white on the belly, with a long dorsal fin. Such was the turbulence with which they passed, that a good view could not be had of them, to make out more nearly the description. These fish attack a whale in the same way that a dog baits a bull, and worry him to death. They are endowed with immense strength, armed with strong, sharp teeth, and generally seize the whale by the lower jaw. It is said the only part they eat of them is the tongue. The sword-fish and thrasher have been also seen to attach the whale together, the sword-fish driving his tremendous weapon into the belly from beneath upward, and the thrasher fastened to his back, and giving him terrific blows with his flail. The thrasher having no power to strike through the water, it has been observed by all who have witnessed these strange combats, that it seems to be the instinctive war policy of the sword-fish to make his attack from below, thus causing the whale to rise above the surface, which, under the prick of the cruel sword of his enemy, he has been known to do, to a great height, the unrelenting thrasher meanwhile holding on like a leech, and dealing his blows unsparingly through the air with all the force of his lengthy frame, sometimes twenty feet.

A Fire on a Chinese River.

The missionary reports from China, as quoted in the Kölnische Zeitung, describes the terrible ravages of a fire which took place on the 1st of Jan., 1848, at Houquang, during the prevalence of an inundation. The Tribune translates some portions of the account.

The fire, which broke out among the shipping, was of unparalled horror. In order to form an idea of it, we must imagine the scene of its devastations. Along the shore of the Ki-ang, for the distance of several miles, so many vessels are usually lying at anchor, that when seen from the opposite bank they resemble a thick forest, but, regarded from a near point, they look like an illimitable, populous city floating upon the water. At a still greater distance, though not so crowded together, many other vessels lie at the same anchoring ground. The whole forms a long harbor, extending many miles, filled with an immense number of ships, and presenting a spectacle of which no one who has not seen it can form a conception. On the night in question, a furious gale struck this multitudinous fleet, and in the confusion which ensued, one of the vessels was found to be on fire. Increased at once by the wind, and fed by the tar and other combustible materials with which a great number of the vessels were loaded, the fire spread like lightning to the neighboring vessels. The violence of the storm and of the fire parted the cables which had thus far confined the burning ships. Scattered by the raging hurricane in every direction, these everywhere spread devastation, turning into flame whatever they touched, and kindling the devouring fire in a moment in the other vessels. In the midst of this terrible sea of fire were heard the shrieks and groans of an immense number of men, who, given over to despair, tossed by the storm, pursued by the flames, and encompassed by the raging waves, were at last burned to a crisp by the fire, or swallowed up by the wild abyss of the stream. The Ki-ang for a great distance resembled a sea of fire, and in the space of three hours all those vessels, with the unhappy men on board, miserably perished. It is agreed on all hands, that the number of vessels, according to a moderate estimate, amounted to more than three thousand. The Chinese boats, as is well known, even the smallest, are inhabited by the family of the captain, together with the crew. Indeed, there are whole households, whose members are born on board, where they live and die without knowing to what country they belong. They come into the world wherever the floating abode of their parents happens to be found. Among the vessels burned were several large ships. Many of them contained from forty to fifty and sixty persons. The bodies, mutilated and disfigured by the fire, which were drawn out of the stream, amounted to sixty thousand. These vessels were loaded with freight, and belonged to Chinese from different provinces. This may show the great loss and general bereavement caused by the fire. Such a terrible conflagration was never known, we will not say in China, but in the whole world. As a native from Ham-yan-fee was surveying the scene of desolation, he was so impressed with the number of the victims that he ordered at his own expense, ten thousand coffins, for the interment of the bodies, which could be afforded for five or six francs. This sum is paid by the poor for their coffins; usually they cost them from thirty to forty francs, and the rich pay several thousands, for the poor idolaters imagine that the more is done for the body the better it will be with the soul.

The Irish.

A traveler in the North of Ireland remarks, that "the peasantry here are probably the most comfortable of any in Ireland; yet our poorest American farmer would hardly live in one of their best cabins. We went into one, the owner of which worked several hundred acres, where the floor was of mud, and where the pigs and ducks seemed to share the different rooms with the inhabitants. There seemed to be no idea of improving their condition with most of them; and even the most successful—like the owner of this cabin—only work with the hope of getting money enough to reach America, where at length they can be comfortable. If you ask them why they do not thatch up that roof, or put a drier flooring down, or do any small work which would add vastly to their comfort, their reply nearly always is, that if they should be doing these things all the while they would starve—'they have'nt time.' But an American or Englishman would always find the time, and manage to live beside. The truth is, as every one can see, these long ages of mismanagement and unequal institutions have at length had their natural effect on the Irish character, and improvidence and a certain want of thoroughness have become almost national traits."

A Suspicious Case.

The Pennsylvanian related the case of a Mr. Samuel Peabody, who was arrested by the watchman on suspicion of being intoxicated. The Mayor desired to know what was Samuel's opinion of the matter. With some appearance of embarrassment he gave the following narrative:—

"Well, sir, I mout have been drunk, and I mout not—I can't pretend to say for certain. The fact is, I've done so little in that way, that I'll be blamed if I know when I am drunk. I dare say some of these police gentlemen are better judges than I am, when it comes to that. But I'll tell your honor exactly what I did and how I felt, and if your honor concludes I was drunk, why I'll pay the fine and say no more about it. You see I was troubled with the wind, and took four glasses of lavender brandy to start it. Soon after, I felt a buzzing in my ears, and the he cups was awful troublesome, but that I thought was the wind coming off. Then it seemed to me, as I walked along the street, that an awning post or water-plug every now or then, would jump right before me, as if they meant to head me off. I was a little mad at this and struck one or two of them with my knuckles, but I found that it was no use, for my fists got the worst of it. It seemed like all the gas lights had faces to them; some winked and some grinned at me, and one that stood before a hotel, nodded as if I was acquainted with me, and made a sort of a sign towards the door, as much as to say, 'Go in, Sam, and get something to drink.' Which I did. When I came out there was the greatest to do that I ever saw; I was sure there was an earthquake, for the houses and steeples were all staggering about, and the street was rocking just like a cradle. It was a most sublime spectacle; so I fetched up against a pump and held on while I took a good look at the magnificent scene. No panorama could come up to it; houses, trees, fences, all rearing and plunging like wild horses! The sight was worth a dollar and a half; if I have to pay a fine, I don't care, for I got the full value of the money. And so, if your honor's any ways suspicious that I was drunk, I'll foot the bill right away, without any grumbling." His honor was a little suspicious, and Mr. Peabody being a man of his word, promptly pulled out his wallet and made a satisfactory settlement.

Largest Grape Vine in the United States.

Under this head, the Natchez Free Trader, of the 10th ult., has the following paragraph:—

"Mr. Wm. Casey, corner of Union and State streets, in the city of Natchez, can boast of a grape vine which is, undoubtedly, the monarch vine of the United States. It rises from the ground in a single trunk of some three inches in diameter, nearly straight and well proportioned to the hight of about nine feet, when it spreads into branches, and covers and embowers the trellis work ef quite a large garden, besides climbing a tall tree. The weight of the immense clusters of grapes hanging upon it, now about half grown, is estimated at a ton. To stretch out any of the branches in a direct line, they would measure from three to four hundred feet. The variety of this grape is not natural to the country, but was brought up to Natchez in the old Spanish times. It is called the "Jack Grape," from "Spanish Jack," the nick-name of the Spaniard who planted it. Some years ago, Madame Bingaman, now dead, offered Mr. Casey five hundred dollars if he would remove the vine safely to her garden in the environs of the city; but no sum of money whatever would induce the owner to part with it. It produces a wine which has the taste of hock."

A Lesson for Girls.

An intelligent gentleman of fortune, says the Bangor Whig, visited a country village in Maine, not far from Bangor, and was hospitably entertained and lodged by a gentleman having three daughters, two of whom in rich dresses entertained the distinguished stranger in the parlor, while one kept herself in the kitchen, assisting her mother in preparing the food and setting the table for tea, and after supper, in doing the work till it was finally completed, when she also joined her sisters in the parlor for the remainder of the evening. The next morning the same daughter was again early in the kitchen, while the other two were in the parlor. The gentleman, like Franklin, possessed a discriminating mind—was a close observer of the habits of the young ladies—watched an opportunity and whispered something in the ear of the industrious one, and then left for a time, but revisited the same family, and in about one year the young lady of the kitchen was conveyed to Boston, the wife of the same gentleman visitor, where she now presides at an elegant mansion. The gentleman, whose fortune she shares, she won by a judicious deportment and well directed industry. So much for an industrious young lady.

WHEN TO KILL A LION.—"I was told here," says a traveler in Southern Africa, "that a lion had just killed an ox, and been shot in the act. It is the habit of the lion, it seems, when he kills a large animal, to spring upon it, and seizing its throat with his fangs, to press the body down with his paws until his victim expires, keeping his eyes closed during the whole time. The Hottentots are aware of this; and on the present occasion one of the herdsmen ran to the spot with his gun, and fired at the lion within a few yards distance;" but being sadly frightened, missed him. The lion stirred not, but kept fast hold on his prey. The Hottentot reloaded, fired and missed again. Loading a third time, he shot the lion dead. "This fact being well authenticated, seemed to me curious and worthy of mention."

IMPORTANT PLANK-ROAD DECISION.—Judge Root, of Oneida, has recently given a decision involving the true interpretation of subdivision 5, section 2, of the Plank-road act of 1849. The opinion was given in the case of "The Waterville and Utica Plank-road Co. vs. Danvers Titus." The following is the substance of the section referred to:—

"Persons living within one mile of any toll-gate shall be permitted to pass at one-half the usual rates of toll, excepting farmers going to or coming from their work on their farms, who shall go free when not employed in the transportation of persons or the property of other persons."

The defendant living within one mile of the gate, claimed that he was bound, under the law, to pay only half toll, while the plaintiff insisted upon full toll. Judge Root decided that the clause "when not employed in the transportation of persons or the property of other persons" excluded from the exemption all who may be employed as carriers—leaving them subject to full toll, as they were, with some slight modification, prior to the act of 1848. Treatment of Monomaniacs.

We often find that men who have accumulated large fortunes from small beginnings, when they have passed the middle age of life, imagine themselves in poverty. A singular case has lately occurred, for the truth of which we can vouch:—

A large manufacturer, residing in the wilds of Yorkshire, one day called on the relieving officer of the district and asked relief.

Appreciating instantly the state of mind in which the well-known applicant was, the officer replied, "Certainly, Mr. ———, call to-morrow, and you shall have it."

Satisfied the applicant retired, and the officer hastened to the gentleman's son, stated the case, and expressed his opinion that the relief demanded should be given.

"Give it," said the son "and we'll return you the money."

Accordingly the wealthy manufacturer next day received relief, and for many weeks regularly applied for his five shillings per week, until at last the halluciation vanished, and his mind was completely restored.

It is possible that this little anecdote contains a valuable hint as to the proper treatment of monomaniacs.

Health of Americans.

There is a curious but indisputable fact, touching our present condition and appearance, as a nation of men, women and children, in which we Americans compare most unfavorably with the people of Europe, and especially with those of Northern Europe—England and France, for example. It is neither in religion or morality, law or liberty. In these great essentials every American feels that his country is the birthplace of a larger number of robust and healthy souls than any other. But in the bodily condition, the signs of physical health, and all that constitutes the outward aspect of the men and women of the United States, our countrymen, and especially countrywomen, compare most unfavorably with all but the absolutely starving classes on the other side of the Atlantic. So completely is this the fact, that though we are unconscious of it at home, the first thing—especially of late years—which strikes an American, returning from abroad, is the pale and sickly countenances of his friends, acquaintances, and almost every one he meets in the streets of large towns—every other man looking as if he had lately recovered from a fit of illness. The men look so pale, and the women so delicate that his eye accustomed to the higher hues of health, and the more vigorous physical condition of transatlantic men and women scarcely credits the assertion of old acquaintances, when they assure him that they were "never better in their lives."

SECRET BALLOT IN MASSACHUSETTS.—Gov. Boutwell, in his Inaugural Message, recommended the substitution of the secret for the open ballot. A bill has been reported by a Legislative Committee in accordance with this suggestion, and we believe it has passed through the several stages in the Senate. It requires that all votes for Governor, Lieut. Governor, Senators, and Representatives, Presidential Electors, and Representatives in Congress, shall be deposited in the ballot-box in sealed envelopes; that the Secretary of State shall provide a sufficient quantity of these to meet the necessities of all the voters in the Commonwealth; that the Town Clerk shall obtain and keep constantly on hand a supply thereof; that the Selectmen shall appoint two persons to take charge of the same at the polls, and furnish the requisite number to each voter; that the Inspectors of Elections shall first count the whole number of envelopes, then open them, and if more than one vote is found in any one envelope, bearing the name of the same person for the same office, reject the surplus; or, if two or more are found therein, bearing the names of different persons for the same office, reject the votes thus found. No envelope, which contains only a blank, shall be counted as a ballot. The bill further requires each voter, when depositing his ballot, to hold it in such a manner that the inspectors can distinctly see whether more than one is placed in the box. Penalties are attached to the bill. The Committee estimate that six envelopes will do for each voter during the year, and that the cost for 75,000 voters need not exceed $1,577.

HORSE-FLESH AGAINST STEAM.—A singular wager has been laid in Spain between the Duke of Osuna and the celebrated banker, Salamanca. It is horse against railroad. The duke bets that his horses shall beat the locomotive on the Madrid and Aranjuez Railroad, which is 27 miles long. Several horses are to be employed, and are to be stationed thus: A jockey and horse at the Toledo gate of Madrid to ride the first league and deliver a paper to the second, who is to be in readiness with another horse to ride another league; and so on. It is said that the Duke calculates that each league may be done in seven minutes, making forty-nine minutes for the whole distance his horses will have to run. The high road on which the horses run is seven leagues in length. The wager is for a million of reals. $125,000.

GEMS FROM JERROLD.—Douglas Jerrold is sometimes severe. Mr. J. A. Heraud, the author of a poem called the "Descent into Hell," an enormously vain man, one evening asked Jerrold—"Have you ever read my 'Descent into Hell?'" "No," said the wit, "I would rather see it!" On another occasion he rebuked Albert Smith, the novelist, who was boasting of his intimacy with Lamartine, the great French statesman. Among other things Smith said that "he and Lamartine were like brothers—in short, that they rowed in the same boat!" Jerrold significantly scratched his head, saying: "You may row in the same boat, but with a different sort of sculls."

SOMEWHAT FASTIDIOUS.—In one of the Boston Courts, last week, a fellow named William Rivers, alias Quincy Ames, was convicted of larceny and sentenced to the House of Correction. But Rivers had "a soul above buttons," and calling an officer to the dock, told him that as the House of Correction was only a place for low and petty offenders, such as drunkards and thieves of the most contemptible sort, he should prefer to be sent to the State Prison. The officer informed Chief Justice Wells of the elevated taste of the gentleman, and the sentence was changed to a year in the State Prison.

Variety.

Dr. Smith, in a late letter from Antwerp, says—"It is one of the national customs, both in Belgium and Holland, to plant the roadside with trees. Between the city of Brussels and Waterloo is one continuous magnificent forest of lofty beeches, the shafts free of all limbs, 40, 50, 60, and 80 feet. For miles in succession, the tops of these magnificent trees meet over the track, at an elevation of perhaps 90 or a hundred feet, in the form of an arch, completely intercepting the sun's rays."

An Irishman, who was very near-sighted, about to fight a duel, insisted that he should stand six paces nearer his antagonist than the other did to him, and that they were both to fire at the same time. This beats Sheridan's telling a fat man, who was going to fight a thin one, that the latter's slim figure ought to be chalked on the other's portly person, and if the bullet hit him outside the chalk mark, it was to go for nothing.

At the University of Berlin there are now in all the faculties 2,107 students, at Bonn 911, at Breslau 923, at Erlangen 394, at Freiburg 359, at Giessen 413, at Gottingen 715, at Griefswalde 189, at Halle 597, at Heidelburgh 557, at Jena 358, at Leipzig 902, at Marburg 263, at Munich 1886, at Tubingen 806, at Wurzburg 672. An Episcopal clergyman in Springfield, Mass., named Adams, claims to have discovered a new way of making burning gas superior to Paine's. He says that by having hollow hellices, filled with mercury instead of water, by constructing the electrodes according to his centrifugal theory of electricity, and by constructing his connecting wires in the same way as the helices, he has been enabled to as far outstrip Mr. Paine in making gas, as Mr. P. has every other who preceded him.

George Bruce, Esq., of New York, has offered a premium of $1,000 to the first inventor who shall construct and submit for judgment a printing press which will throw off 500 large imperial sheets per hour, and can be sold for $500. The patent-right of the successful press will be the sole property of the inventor, and ought to insure him a moderate fortune.

In the Swiss Canton of Zug, the public servants are paid with true republican economy. The Chief Magistrate gets 260 francs ($52) a year, the Chief of Police 100 francs, and 1 franc for each sitting of his Court. The Chief Justice has, instead of a salary, as heretofore, 6 francs a day; the Superior Judges, Cantonal Judges and their substitutes, 3½ francs. The President of the Grand Council has 150 francs a year; the States' Attorney 100 francs.

The family that never took a newspaper has moved into Illinois. The old gentleman was surprised the other day, to learn that gold had been discovered in California—and the oldest daughter was pleased to learn from a neighbor that Webster had been hung, and now she would never again be troubled with "them pesky spelling books."

THE EQUALITY OF THE RACES.

Reply to D. E. Maxson. [Concluded.

In order to overthrow the authority of Scripture, or at least to make it clash with historical testimony, a class of infidel writers, of whom we may instance Volney, boldly assumed that Egypt was peopled by emigrant Negroes from Ethiopia, and consequently that the biblical accounts of the deluge, the descent of Noah from the ark, and the dispersion of mankind from the plains of Shinar, could not be correct, since, in the period from Noah to Abraham, no such extensive emigrations could have taken place, considering the primitive character of the times, and the insurmountable difficulties of the route; to say nothing of the centuries required to effect their transmutation into Negroes through the influence of climate, and other extraneous causes. These writers, to establish their position, quoted largely from Herodotus, sometimes correctly, sometimes incorrectly, lauding at the same time the learning, accuracy, and veracity of the Greek; but every word uttered in his praise was designed to disparage the Scriptures, because, from the very nature of things, both could not possibly be correct. Subsequently the same erroneous statements found a place in the writings of others, who made quotations without sufficient examination of their authenticity, or a due consideration of their immediate tendency.

In 1816 a new era opened in Egyptian History. The Rosetta Stone was overturned, and Champollion, with his associates, the scientific engineer corps attached to the French army under Bonaparte, gathered around it. Upon this stone was written an inscription in three different characters—one Greek, another Coptic, a third the ancient hieroglyphical language of Egypt. From the explication of the Greek, the Coptic could be understood; from the Coptic, the hieroglyphics. It proved to be the ancient history of Egypt, and from that moment the Rosetta Stone became the focus of interest to the learned world. Its value as an account of Egypt, written by the Egyptians themselves, was the least part of its importance. Christianity would be vitally affected by the decision. If Egypt was a Negro colony, and peopled from African Ethiopia, the chronology of Scripture, and the relation of the dispersion of mankind from the plains of Shinar, must be abandoned. If Egypt was peopled by Caucasians from Assyria, the authenticity of the holy text was completely established. The reader may anticipate the result. It was clearly proven, that the Delta was as old as the flood; that Lower Egypt was first inhabited; that the inhabitants were the Caucasian children of Ham; and that the scriptural accounts were correct. It was clearly proven, that Menes was the first king of Egypt; that Memphis was the oldest city; that this city was in Lower Egypt; and that the descendants of Ham, coming from Asia, and spreading over the Nilotic valley, considered Lower Egypt as the most eligible site for a metropolis, for great works, and for the primitive seat of monarchial government. Upon this subject a volume might be written. I refer the reader, however, to the writings of Champollion himself, and to Gliddon's new work on Egypt, where the above accounts are abundantly substantiated.

We will now show that the testimony of Herodotus is not above all criticism, and that it is not of itself sufficient to establish any point. This Greek historian visited Egypt about 430 years B. C., during the dominion of the Persians, and when the country had much deteriorated from its pristine greatness. Though a learned and respectable man, he was in Egypt a stranger; and it is evident from his own writings, that he chiefly associated with the Greek and Persian conquerors. He tells us, indeed, that he visited Upper Egypt as far as the first cataract; yet we must hope (for his own sake) that he did not, since he left Thebes undescribed, and repeated the idle tale that the sources of the Nile were at Elephantine. In his day five hundred years of decline had been deteriorating the priest-caste, the only depositories of history in Egypt. Manetho had not yet written his Chronicles of the Kings of Egypt in Greek. Consequently Herodotus could have no history to consult written by the Egyptians themselves, in a language with which he was familiar. He must have been dependent on interpreters for the information which he derived from their histories, and if, as we have a fair right to do, we judge of the interpreters of that day by those of the present in the same country, we should not expect him to derive much authentic information from them. Like some English and other modern writers, who compose volumes on that misrepresented country, that are, like Hedge's razors, only made to sell, Herodotus prepared his work to read at the Olympic games, to Grecian audiences, more ignorant in those days on Egyptian affairs than even Europeans of modern times are generally; and it was necessary to interlard his discourse with "travelers' tales." Since the true history of Egypt has been made known to us from the explication of the hieroglyphics, the inconsistencies, misstatements, misconceptions, misrepresentations and absurdities, that are continually exposed in the accounts of Herodotus, strongly remind one of Sir Walter Raleigh, who professed to discover the Anthropophagi in South America. Go, ask the merest schoolboy whether the sources of the Nile are at Elephantine, and then judge whether the accounts of Herodotus are above all criticism, and whether his testimony alone is sufficient to establish any point. Gliddon says that the representations of the Greeks, and their pupils the Romans, concerning ancient Egypt as a country, and the ancient Egyptians as a people, are even more erroneous than the accounts of English travelers concerning our own country.

That the reader may fully understand this point, I consider it necessary to refer for the second time to the chronology of Scripture. From the descent of Noah from the ark, to the time of Abraham's location in Egypt, there is a fraction over three hundred years; but let us remember, that for nearly two hundred years of that period all mankind were resident upon the plains of Shinar, which proves, in the first place, that their increase could not have been much greater than it is now; and, in the second place, that if nearly two centuries were required to people Assyria, the remaining period from Mizraim to Abraham, being but a fraction over one hundred years, would be utterly insufficient to transport them, their flocks, their herds, and their families, from the land of Shinar, whatever might be the route, to the island of Merve in Ethiopia, there wait for them to invent the arts, to be transmuted from Caucasians into Negroes, (for I must repeat it again, that if they were Negroes from the first, it was not climate that effected the change,) and thence to descend the Nile, and people Lower Egypt, since it is indisputable, according to the testimony of Scripture, that Lower Egypt was inhabited in the time of Abraham, whose journey from the plain of Moreh to the former country was neither long nor difficult of accomplishment. Let us remember, also, that although the shortness of that period utterly precludes the transpiration of these events, there is an abundant space of time for them, journeying as they did towards the west, to enter Egypt spread over the valley of the Nile, and acquire the appearance of prosperity that they exhibited, according to the holy text, in the patriarch's time. Let the reader give this subject a candid and impartial examination, and decide on either theory by the measure of its probability. The accounts of many modern travelers, like those of Trollope, Maryatt, and Dickens, on American affairs, seem designed to caricature and defame a country chiefly venerable for its antiquity; and, bearing within themselves the impress of absurdity, are really too puerile and silly to require a refutation, as they cannot possibly mislead any intelligent and sensible person. Indeed, what better could be expected of tourists, who, from a two weeks' residence in modern Cairo, an occasional conversation with an Arab Rais, a donkey-driver, or hotel-keeper, consider themselves as perfectly competent to decide upon all the contested points of Egyptian history?

In short, those who describe the ancient Egyptians as Negroes, describe them differently from what they have represented themselves on the most ancient monuments. See Belzoni, Champollion, Morton, and Gliddon—names well known in all literary circles. And however unwilling those who contend for the equality of the races may be to admit it, it is nevertheless a well-established fact, that the African theories are based upon no critical examination of early history—are founded upon no scriptural authority for early migrations—are supported by no monumental evidence—or hieroglyphical data—and cannot be borne out or admitted by practical common sense. Instead of originating from Africa, civilization has but partially penetrated into that benighted country, either in ancient or modern times; instead of springing from Negro races, it has never as yet made any permanent impression upon their habits or manners, in their native country—the interior parts and western coasts of Africa. To look for civilization among the Negro tribes would be like looking for the Anthropophagi in South America, El Dorado in Mexico, or the Fountain of Youth in Cuba, except in those districts where Caucasian influences prevail.

If the advocates of the African origin of the Egyptians cling to the superior antiquity of the pyramids of Merve, as a proof of the origin of civilization in Ethiopia, and its subsequent descent in Egypt, they are easily placed in a series of dilemmas. If they deny Caucasian introduction at Merve, in the hope of vindicating the ancient mental and physical capabilities of Negro races, they must reject Scripture altogether, both for chronology and primitive migrations. The advocates of the African theories appear, either purposely or otherwise, to have mistaken the locality of the Ethiopia mentioned in the Scriptures and ancient geographies. This country was in the eastern parts of Arabia. We hear that the wife of Moses was an Ethiopian; yet Moses fed the flock of his father-in-law at the foot of Mount Horeb. From the same country came Zerah, the Ethiopian, to fight with king Asa; for to suppose, as my friend has done, that a million of men, with a corresponding train of horses and chariots, could be transported from African Ethiopia to the borders of India, in the time and with the ease that Zerah's expedition is mentioned in Scripture as taking place, is an unmitigated absurdity, and must be so considered by any one in the least acquainted with the difficulties of army transportation. According to ancient geographers, a large proportion of Arabia, at the time of the Christian era, bore the name of Asiatic Ethiopia. That Egypt received a proportion of its early inhabitants from this quarter, is not improbable; but the hypothesis that they came from Ethiopia in Africa, is utterly untenable, unless we abandon Scripture. "To history be the decision referred"—not to "travelers' tales." Let the reader consult all the authorities to whom I have referred him, and then judge who has "reared the man of straw," and who, moreover, seems endowed with miraculous power of vision, to behold Negro nations where none of that kind ever existed.

TAMAR DAVIS.

N. B. Will my friend please to designate those Negro tribes who are assuming Caucasian characteristics with their changes in locality? The assumption that the Phœnicians were Negroes is too utterly absurd to require a refutation, and every one in the least acquainted with history must be apprized of the fact. Their being Canaanites has nothing to do with the question. Who has assumed that all the descendants of Canaan were Negroes? Not me, nor Lawrence, nor Bishop Sumner. Like his brethren, he was a Caucasian, and a white man indisputably, before the pronunciation of Noah's prophetic malediction, whatever he might have been subsequently, and such being the case, a proportion of his descendants might have been free from its consequences. For my own part, I incline to the opinion that the events of Babel produced the diversity in the human race; but even there it was only upon a part of the Cushites and a part of the Canaanites that the wrath of the Almighty descended. As a large proportion of my friend's last article is a tissue of evasion, misrepresentation, and misconception, and throws no new light upon the subject, I shall take no further notice of it than to refer the reader to a second perusal of my former articles. T. D.

BIBLE DESTITUTION.

A colporteur writes to the Baptist Recorder some remarkable instances of destitution that have come under his observation in Central New York. In one town, where an aged Christian said he did not know of any destitute families, the colporteur found three of the man's own children married, and living without an entire copy of the Scriptures. In some towns one-sixth of the families were destitute. Do not take it for granted that any one is supplied without inquiry. He says:— [Independent.

"I called on a family consisting of five persons, viz: The parents, their two children, and neice, who was fifteen years of age. The man was absent. I proposed to sell some books to his wife. She replied that she had no money, and should she buy books she could not read them. Cannot your husband read? I asked. 'Not much,' was her reply. Have you any good books? 'No.' Have you a Bible? 'No.' Have you a Testament? 'No.' Have you any book? 'No.' Have you ever heard the Gospel preached? 'When young I heard ministers preach.' Have you heard the Bible read? 'While living at my father's I heard it read.' Have you any recollection of what you heard read from the Bible or heard ministers preach? 'No,' Do you believe there is a heaven and a hell? 'Yes.' Can you tell me how a person can be saved from hell and go to heaven? 'No.' Have you ever heard of Jesus Christ, of his sufferings and death, that sinners might be saved? 'I have no recollection that I have heard of him.' The neice manifested, if possible, still greater ignorance, having no remembrance of ever having heard a sermon or a chapter read from the Bible."

MATERNAL INFLUENCE.

Gov. Briggs, in a lecture on Popular Education, recently delivered, related the following impressive incident:—

I remember, twelve or fifteen years ago, I left Washington three or four weeks during the spring. While at home, I for the first time possessed myself of the letters of Mr. Adams' mother, and read them with exceeding interest. I remember an expression in one of the letters addressed to her son, while yet a boy of twelve years old, in Europe; says she, "I would rather see you laid in your grave, than that you should grow up a profane and graceless boy." After I returned to Washington, I went over to Mr. Adams' seat, one day, and said I, "Mr. Adams, I have found out who made you!"

"What do you mean?" said he.

I said, "I have been reading the letters of your mother!"

If I had named that dear name to some little boy, who had been for weeks away from his dear mother, his eye could not have flashed more brightly, or his face glowed more quickly, than did the eye and face of that venerable old man when I pronounced the name of his mother. He started up, in his peculiar manner, and emphatically said,

"Yes, Mr. Briggs, all that is good in me I owe to my mother."

Oh, what a testimony was that, from this venerable old man to his mother, who had in his remembrance all the scenes of his manhood! "All that there is good in me I owe to my mother!" Mothers! think of this when your bright-eyed little boy is about you! Mothers make the first impressions upon the minds of your children, and those impressions will be the last—the last to be effaced.

AN OLD MAN'S REBUKE.—A good old man was once in company with a gentleman who occasionally introduced into conversation the words "devil," "deuce," etc., and who, at last took the name of God in vain. "Stop, sir," said the old man, "I said nothing while you only used freedom with the name of your own master, but I insist upon it that you shall use no freedom with the name of mine."

Pale poverty, or wealth,
Corroding care, or calm repose,
Spring's balmy breath, or Winter's snows,
Sickness, or buoyant health—
Whate'er betide,
If God provide,
'T is for the best—I wish no lot beside.

My times are in Thy hand!
Should friendship pure illume,
And strew my path with fairest flowers;
Or should I spend life's dreary hours
In solitude's dark gloom,
Thou art a friend,
Till time shall end,
Unchangeably the same; in Thee all beauties blend.

My times are in Thy hand!
Many or few my days,
I leave with Thee—this only pray,
That by thy grace, I, every day
Devoting to Thy praise,
May ready be
To welcome Thee,
Whene'er Thou comest to set my spirit free.

My times are in Thy hand!
Howe'er those times may end,
Sudden, or slow, my soul's release,
Midst anguish, frenzy, or in peace,
I am safe with Christ, my Friend!
If He is nigh,
Howe'er I die,
'T will be the dawn of heavenly ecstacy.

My times are in Thy hand!
To Thee I can entrust
My slumbering clay, till Thy command
Bids all the dead before Thee stand,
Awaking from the dust.
Beholding Thee,
What bliss 't will be
With all Thy saints to spend Eternity!

To spend Eternity
In Heaven's unclouded light—
From sorrow, sin, and frailty free—
Beholding and resembling Thee—
O, too transporting sight!
Prospect too fair
For flesh to bear!
Haste! Haste, my Lord! and soon transport me there!

☞ Through the kindness of a valued friend, who has taken the trouble to transcribe a dozen of pages, for me, from a very interesting work, with an equally attractive title — "The Ministry of the Beautiful," which has recently been re-published, at my own suggestion, from the London copy, by Mr. A. Hart, of the late firm of Cary & Hart, Philadelphia, I am enabled to send the following extract for insertion in the Recorder, the work having been gotten up too beautifully to be risked on the case of a printing office. The article, The Sacred Lake, affords an excellent moral even to professing Christians; and the book from which it is taken I cheerfully add, is a work of rare merit, in these days of degenerate literature—one of elevated purpose and holy aims—a work worthy of the careful and repeated perusal of every one who aspires to the enjoyment of our higher nature—to the sublime emotions awakened by the beautiful in nature, and the profound adoration which it is the mission of the beautiful in nature to inspire in the heart of man for the Framer of the Universe and the Maker of our Spirits. W. M. F.

THE SACRED LAKE.

There was once a land where the priests had no faith; they performed all the ceremonies of religion, told all the stories of the gods, and received their full share of the good things of the world, as heretofore, but their religion was dead, and there was no life in anything they did. And the people of that land grew discontented, and some believed nothing, and walked in divers evil ways; and others believed in herds, flocks, merchandize, and gold, which they gave all their diligence to increase, and they thought only of being wealthy, and having dominion over their fellow men. Now it came to pass, after a long time, that some inhabitants of the land took counsel together, and said, "Behold now we have no religion and no gods, for they whom our fathers worshiped are dead, if indeed they were ever alive at all and not the fancies of a distempered brain. Let us go forth in search of a religion and a god, for never was a state great that did not dedicate its worship to some mighty power, able to protect and cherish it."

Now, while they were deliberating, one appeared among them, and said, "Forty days' journey across the wilderness, and through the dark forests, is a valley among the mountains; very precipitous are its sides, and so lofty that they shut out the light of day; huge rocks are at its entrance, and rough with blocks of broken stone is the path that winds through it. No tree waves its branches across the dark stream that rushes through the midst, and in which the stars flash with inconstant light; nor is any moss upon its banks, neither any bird nor beast, for it is a valley of desolation. The quick waters pass by without any noise; and when they strike against a stone, a misty spray is thrown into the air, but no sound is heard, for it is a valley of silence. Seven days' journey up the valley of Desolation and Silence is the source of the mysterious stream, a small lake, girt round with jagged and tremendous rocks, and fed by slender brooks that descend from the eternal snows that crown the summit of the lofty mountain. When the clouds are rent, the eye can soar upward through the deep immeasurable blue ether, but far beyond its ken stands the top of the mountain, and upon it is built the everlasting Throne of Heaven. Whosoever reaches the lake and looks steadfastly in its waters shall behold the image of his god, and the rites and services of religion shall be revealed to him on its shores. If any one would seek the valley of Revelation, let him journey forty days to the east of the city, and then he shall find a raven sitting upon an ash tree, and she will guide him to its gloomy gates."

Then the people wished to ask questions of their unexpected visitor, but he was gone from among them. And they drew lots who should go forth in search of the valley and its wondrous lake; and it fell upon one of the elders of the city, who had made much money, and thought nothing so good as gold.

He journeyed forty days without much adventure, and came to the raven sitting upon the ash; and the raven arose and flew slowly, and he followed her, and at last she perched on a distant rock at the foot of the mountain; and when he came to the spot, the raven croaked thrice and flew away. Then the elder found himself at the entrance of the valley. He looked back towards the city, and the sun was shining brilliantly, and bright clouds were careering through the joyous sky, and on every tree were birds caroling and making their untaught melody. Then he looked before him down the valley; but not far could he see through the thickening gloom, but discerned huge masses of cold grey rock dimly looming through the shade, and saw the foaming billows of the silent stream. His heart almost failed him, but he felt a secret impulse that urged him on. The further he penetrated, into the valley the deeper grew the gloom; and in the dimly-flashing water he beheld, as it were, torn and scattered fragments of pale starlight. He turned his eye upward, and the heavens were almost black, and studded with stars, which moved and changed as he advanced. There was no wind, and not a sound met his ear; even his own footsteps fell silently on the hard and rugged rocks he trod. When he judged by the changing stars that seven days and nights had passed away, there stood before him a great wall of mighty rocks, over which fell in a broad sheet, and casting up much spray, the waters of the silent stream. He sat down on a rock, and looked up at the craggy hight from which the river fell, and wondered how he should be able to ascend.

At length, he saw rough unhewn steps, and with much toil he got up them, and reached the shores of a small lake girt round with stupendous crags, which rendered further ascent impossible, and gave a wild and fearful aspect to the scene. He looked up, and through a rent in the clouds he saw the mountain towering to the skies; but in vain did he endeavor to behold its summit. The snow on its lofty sides stood like a pillar of dazzling light amid the dark blue sky, and round it clusters the planets and stars.

He looked steadfastly into the water of the lake, and a mist seemed to rise from its bosom, which caused him to sink down upon the bank in a deep sleep. As he slept, it seemed that the curtains of the mist drew away and suffered him to behold the surface of the lake, in which he saw reflected a splendid city, in the center of which was a mart, where all manner of rich produce was bought and sold. In the midst of the mart a throne of ivory and sandal-wood, overlaid with filigree work of gold, and blazing with a thousand gems. On the throne sat an idol whose face was of furbished gold, and whose limbs were clothed in a tissue of rubies and pearls. The eyes flashed like carbuncles, and the mouth was of great size and constantly open. The idol had a crown upon its head, and instead of a scepter a large gold key, upon which was inscribed, in all the languages of the earth, "This is the key of life, and of the gates of heaven."

Throughout the city the poor worshiped the rich, and served them with fear and trembling. The rich worshiped the idol that was set in the midst, and every morning each one brought the hearts of poor men and cast them into the mouth of the idol; and he who cast in most prospered for that day, and for him the golden key opened the palaces of life and heaven.

The wanderer asked to see these sacred abodes. He was told that no mortal could behold them; but he was conducted to the gates, and they were of pearl, and had emerald locks.

While he was gazing at the beautiful gates, there came a party of the spirits of men who had just died; and they were taken before a judge, who inquired how much money they had made upon earth. The richest was received with much honor, and for him the idol allowed the golden key to open the gates of heaven.

Some were conducted to the mart, and told to finish there the work of wealth; others, who had made nothing on earth, were told their good deeds were of no value, and would not pass current in the land of spirits; and they were given to be slaves to the rich men, who took their hearts and cast them into the idol's mouth.

Then the wanderer awoke, and heard voices saying, "Mammon is the true god, and gold is the key of life and heaven." When he returned to the city, he told those things to the elders; and there was much rejoicing among the rich men of the city, and they grew richer every day, and built altars to Mammon, and sacrificed tha hearts of the poor.

Nevertheless, there were much anxiety to know what the joys of the rich man's heaven were, and many thought that the old man ought to have contrived to look through the pearly gates. And it came to pass that they determined to send another traveler, who should endeavor, were it only to get a peep through a chink; but there was much difficulty in finding one bold enough to go through the valley of Desolation and Silence.

Now, in order to determine who should go, they cast lots again, and the lot fell upon a valiant soldier, a captain of the bravest band, who forthwith set out upon his journey. He found the raven, and journeyed up the silent valley, and came to the rocky steps, and ascended to the mysterious lake. He too beheld the mountain towering out of sight in the clear blue sky, and saw its crown of shining stars. Before him rose the mist, and he sank on the shore in a deep sleep. The mist drew aside like the curtains of a tent, and he beheld a mighty warrior seated on a splendid horse. The armor of the warrior was black, and over the helmet was a regal crown. In his hand he held a mighty sword, which he waved towards all corners of the earth, and it sprinkled the nations with blood. Upon the blade was traced, in characters of flame, "The god of battles is omnipotent, and the sword opens the gates of heaven."

Then came officers and troops flushed with victory; and they poured the blood of the vanquished at the warrior's feet, who received them with honor; and for them the sword opened the gates of heaven, which were of iron and brass; but the soldier pilgrim was not permitted to look through them.

Then he awoke, and heard voices saying, "The god of war is omnipotent, and the sword prevails over earth and heaven."

Now, when the soldier returned and told his tale, it was heard with murmuring; and the rich men would not believe it. Nevertheless, the fighting men received it, and smote many of the rich and took their wealth. Moreover, they built altars to the god of war, and every day they poured blood upon them. And there was strife between the worshipers of the two gods.

At length, a priest arose, and said that he would go and bring back a true account of the religion and worship which ought to prevail in the land. So the priest went and found the raven, and was conducted to the valley and ascended to the lake. He also looked up and saw the mountain with its snows and stars; but the summit was far beyond his ken. Then the mist arose from the lake, and the priest fell asleep. The mist seemed to float over the water of the lake, and gradually assumed the form of a stately temple. In it were windows of the richest colors, and great store of sculpture, and the most entrancing pictures. Solemn music rolled through the building, and priests, in robes of velvet, adorned with lace and gold, and gems, performed a stately sacrifice, and walked in long procession through the aisles. As they went along they trod on the necks of the prostrate crowd, and they chanted, "High and mighty is the god of priestcraft, terrible to his enemies, and giving to the priests alone the key of heaven."

And then came crowds of people, and they brought their wealth to the priests, who waved it before the altar to a terrible idol, surrounded by dark sulphurous clouds, and then enjoyed it themselves.

Then the pilgrim priest awoke, and voices said, "Serve the priests, for they alone have the key of heaven." He felt much grieved that he had not been allowed to look into heaven; but went his way home, and prevailed much with the people, and drew away the greater part from the gods of money and of war; for he blessed the banners of the soldiers, and the gains of the dealers, whenever they presented him with a share of the spoil, and allowed them to impute the attributes of their own deities to the one he revealed to them. But there were still unquiet spirits in the land, and these were the poor, who had no part in the heaven of the rich man or the warrior, and who could not afford to offer much to the priests, and likewise many learned men, who passed their lives in reading the volume of the stars, contemplating the bowels of the earth, and studying the properties of minerals and herbs, and who felt strong misgivings as to what religion ought to prevail in the land.

At length, one of these men set out, telling neither the priests, nor the rich men, nor the soldier, whither he was going, for all of them, in their hearts, hated the philosophers.

Now, the philosopher had a little child, and she went with him to the valley of Revelation, which they reached in the same manner as those had done who had gone before them. They looked up towards the summit of the mountain, but far beyond their view it was lost in a blaze of the purest light, which made the brilliant stars look pale. The mist arose, and they both slept on the bank of the lake.

An angel came to the philosopher, and showed him the foundations of the world, and led him from star to star, explaining the mysteries of every constellation. The angel showed him no idol, but made him feel the spirit of the universe, and told him that, "Wisdom and knowledge are the keys of heaven."

An angel came also to the child, and she felt a warmer love glowing upon her than she had ever known before; every angry passion seemed to melt away, and the happiest and kindest forms gathered around; and the child awoke, hearing voices singing, "The pure and simple of heart shall enter the gates of heaven."

When both awoke, each told the vision of his dream, and the philosopher pondered the matter well in his heart; and behold, as they journeyed home, the valley was full of life, and glad sounds arose from it. At the entrance was a beautiful shape, who thus addressed them: "Marvel not at the result of your visit to the Sacred Lake, or at the tales of those who have gone before you; few can see more in its mysterious waters than the reflections of their own hearts. Knowledge and wisdom are indeed keys of heaven, but to these must be added faith and love. The heaven of the rich man, of the warrior, of the priest, and of the philosopher, vary in value, and in the depth of their disappointments; but when wisdom and knowledge are joined to faith and love, be it in the bosom of rich or poor, priest or philosopher, to him shall the true and eternal heaven be opened by the Lord of Life."

THE CHARM OF AN OLD HOUSE.

I love old houses best, for the sake of the odd closets and cupboards, and good thick walls that do n't let the wind blow in, and little out-of-the-way polyangular rooms, with great beams running across the ceiling—old heart of oak, that has outlasted half a score of generations—and chimney-pieces with the date of the year carved above them, and huge fire-places that warmed the shins of Englishmen before the house of Hanover came over. The most delightful associations that ever made me feel, and think, and fall a-dreaming, are excited by old buildings—not absolute ruins, but in a state of decline. Even the clipped yews interest me; and if I found one in any garden that should become mine, in the shape of a peacock, I should be as proud to keep his tail well-spread as the man who first carved him.

AIMING AT AN OBJECT IN PREACHING.

We hold it as truth not to be disputed, that a minister of the gospel should never stand up to preach without having some definite object in view. If any consider us harsh in our judgment, we cannot help it. But we suspect that some ministers approach their pulpit exercises, without aiming at any thing more than the delivery of a speech of about the usual length. The time comes round, and they know that it is expected that they will have something to say. They do indeed say it, and perhaps what they say is all true. They preach nothing but what is in strict accordance with the word of God, it may be. But if they were asked what particular object they had been aiming at, it is not unlikely that they would be constrained to acknowledge, that their principal object had been the performance of a task, which they knew that they could not, with credit to themselves, omit. Alas! how sad the thought that any minister of Jesus Christ can so far forget the nature of his calling! Sad as it is, however, there are those upon whom this sin is chargeable, not as an occasional fault, but as a confirmed habit.

When the sportsman betakes himself to the forest with his gun, has he not some object distinctly before him? What he wishes to do—what he means to do, if possible—is to secure game. He charges his piece, therefore, with ammunition adapted for the purpose. He looks out with careful step; and when the animal which he wishes to secure passes within range of his gun, immediately he takes sure aim, and fires. He does not occupy his time in loading his piece, and discharging it at nothing. That would be boys-play. He has an object, and fires his gun only for the sake of accomplishing that object. But does not the minister too often fire at nothing? O how much boys-play does the Searcher of Hearts behold in the pulpit exercises of those who claim to be his ministers!

Let the minister of Jesus Christ aim at an object. He may declaim against sin in general terms, year after year, setting forth its dangerous consequences and the necessity of fleeing to Christ as the only Refuge. But this is not enough. He must preach, not only about sin, but to sinners. The guilty must be made to feel themselves personally concerned in what he says. A great outcry is sometimes made because the preacher is too personal in his remarks. But he who fails to expose the specific forms in which sin manifests itself among the people of his charge, and deals altogether in general propositions, lest some one should writhe and take offense, is any thing but a faithful minister. "Show unto the people all their abominations," was God's command to the prophet. God meant that Ezekiel should take up the particular forms of wickedness which abounded in the land, and dwell upon them, till the guilty should feel themselves personally reproved. So when Nathan was sent to David, he did not talk to him about the evil of sin in general terms, but set forth the heinousness of the particular crime of which the king had been guilty, and then says, "Thou art the man." In fact, the most of the preaching of which we have any account in the Bible, was direct and personal. With what directness did the prophets inveigh against the specific forms of transgression which obtained among the Jews. If the people committed adultery, and "neighed every one after his neighbor's wife," they were told of it without any mealy-mouthedness, and warned that God would be "avenged on such a nation." If they dealt in "scant measure," or with "the wicked balances and the bag of deceitful weights," they were held up to reproof in the most pointed manner. If the "poor was sold for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes," if the rich gave forth their money upon usury, if the priest and the prophet "erred through strong drink," if "their feet ran to evil, and they made haste to shed innocent blood," if "truth fell in the street," and "judgment was turned away," and the orphan and the widow were defrauded, God's ministers exposed all these abominations with searching hand. Not less direct was the preaching of our Saviour. The ostentatious hypocrisy of the Pharisees, their extortions from widows under the cloak of long prayers, their outside righteousness covering over the most abominable iniquity, and all their deliberate and adroitly-planned efforts to keep men out of the kingdom of heaven, were laid open in such a manner as to show that He, who spake as never man spake, never preached without having some specific object to accomplish. Equally direct should be the preaching of all his ministers.

But who is he that can preach thus? The pastor, who knows nothing of the spiritual condition of those under his charge, will find it impossible. But let him inquire into their state, and he will find cases requiring to be treated in a particular manner. One will have fallen under heavy affliction, and the exercises of his mind in that state will be peculiar, according to his peculiar constitution, or according to the principles and maxims in which he has been educated. Another will have come into contact with heresy in some form, and his views have become darkened and perverted. A third will have been affected in some peculiar manner by his business, and, as a consequence, his mind is in an unhappy state. A fourth will have had some unpleasant altercation with his neighbor. A fifth will have been beguiled into some place of sinful amusement, and so on. These varied cases require varied treatment, and the investigation of them will be such a fruitful source of topics for pulpit discussion, that the pastor will always have some important object before him, when he stands up to preach Christ. But the slothful pastor, or the one who is so worldly minded as to have no heart for pastoral duties, will become so barren of topics that he will always be under the necessity of dealing only in what are called fundamental and general principles. And what is much to be lamented, the people too often "love to have it so."

GLASGOW, March 28th, 1851.

The Pope's appointment of Bishops for England has not, as was affirmed by his Archbishop, restored our country to the Papal orbit. The English reject his claims, and refuse to believe that his priests come laden with blessings to them. We look abroad upon lands that are fully under the influence of the system, and see nothing to recommend it; we look at the character of those amongst ourselves who are its subjects and its victims, and dread the effect of farther encouragement. The Papal Aggression Bill was therefore read a second time in the House of Commons three nights ago, by the large majority of 438 to 95. It will go into Committee after the holidays, when we hope it will be strengthened. The discussion has been much prolonged; but this has not served the Papal cause, as the majority on the second reading has proved greater than on the first. The discussion has indeed served to show that some of our leading statesmen, if they have not a real love for Popery, have at least too little dread and dislike of it. There is little reason to doubt, however, that the Protestant feeling has been strengthened by several recent instances of Papal fraud, duplicity, and covetousness, of unmistakable character. The Duke of Wellington was obliged to give public contradiction to the assertion that he had promised to an Irish priest to support the prayer of a petition against the Bill—which petition the Duke had even declined to present. But the case which has most excited attention is that of Miss Talbot, who is in a Nunnery, and who, even from the statement of the Romish Bishop of the district in which it is situated, was clearly doomed to be a nun, although she herself never designed such a thing. The Bishop has publicly declared that she is a postulant (a nun in prospective.) She herself says she is not. Miss Talbot will soon (on reaching majority) be entitled to about £80,000; and the Bishop was calculating on the whole or principal part being applied to the purposes of his church. But, happily for the young lady, she is a ward of Chancery; and although designed, by relatives of the Romish faith, to have been sacrificed for the aggrandizement of the Church, the Lord Chancellor has interfered and ordered her removal from the Nunnery, having provided lodgings for her with a lady in London. As Miss T. has declared to the Chancellor her desire to return to society, the priesthood are likely to be balked of the prize which seemed to them so secure; while the case, with another shameless one in which an old miserly Frenchman in London was on his death-bed made to assign over £7,000 for Romish purposes, has drawn such attention to their proceedings as may be useful in diminishing their future success.

But we are far from believing that either the Prime Minister's Bill for repelling the aggression, or any measures likely to be adopted, will prove of avail for preventing the extension of Popery amongst us. The secret of the success of this and of every other false system, is the means provided for appeasing awakened consciences without the need of dealing with the Holy One. As vital religion decays in the land, the encouragement to such fallacious hopes will increase, as being more required. Already is Puseyism taking Rome's place, to a large extent, in this very matter, and comparatively little is being done to arrest it. A few persons have been arrested in the attempt to remove all distinction between the English episcopacy and the Romish hierarchy, and many more have passed over from the one to the other; but it is understood, that 1,700 clergymen of the English Church are, in the fullest sense of the words, Puseyistic or Tractarian—essentially they are Papists. It is true that the Bishop of London has been compelled by public opinion, and, perhaps, the constraints of higher influences, to require the resignation of the priest of St. Barnabas, at Pimlico; but although Mr. Bennett preached farewell discourses on Sunday last, and completed the deed of resignation two days afterward, his well-instructed congregations, both of St. Pauls and St. Barnabas, prizing fully the "histrionics" he introduced, have tendered their protest against the decision which removes him. There are, besides, other churches within the diocese of the Bishop of London in little less need of purgation, which his Lordship seems little disposed to correct. In reference to one such chapel a correspondence has taken place between the Bishop and Sir Benjamin Hall, M. P., which exhibits the former in a very unfavorable light. As the conclusion of the correspondence, the Knight calls upon the Bishop, if unable to restrain the Romanizing practices of his clergy, to resign, and allow his place to be filled by some one more able or willing to do so. It is, indeed, reported that the Archbishop of Canterbury, having invited all the prelates to a conference at Lambeth upon the Papal question, they have resolved to issue some test for the detection of Puseyism, but which the Morning Chronicle (a paper in the interest of the Puseyites.) seems to think will be set at naught by the party. Mr. Bennett, it is stated, has been appointed to a charge on the island of Cumbrae, transferring his histrionics from the Thames to the Clyde. But we have in Scotland so much of Puseyism in the Episcopal Church, that any importation seems a work of supererogation. A correspondence has been established between a Mr. Dorsey, one of the plants here of this degenerate vine, and his diocesan, the Bishop of Glasgow—for no Bill has prevented these Scottish dissenters from the Presbyterian Establishment from taking territorial titles—arising out of the histrionics practiced by the former, even at our doors. This man not only defends his praying with his face to the east, on the ground of its antiquity, as "a venerable practice," but because "it beautifully represents our looking to the source of light—the scriptural type and title of our Lord;" just as the Papist and the Pagan plead that they use the image as a help to their devotions.

The roof of the Crystal Palace is found not to be proof against the rains of our climate, and is giving some anxiety from the danger which this defect may occasion to the goods placed under it. We fear, indeed, that evil rather than good may come from this Exhibition in other respects. "The Philosopher's Mite to the Great Exhibition of 1851," sounds alarm of danger from such numbers being gathered together—tracing the Black Death, the Sweating Sickness, Plague, and other alarming diseases which have prevailed, to the numbers, in former ages, which were convened at Ecclesiastical Synods. There may be no truth in this, and yet there may be error in the motives and danger in the result of the Exhibition. By the middle of the present month, 5,000 season tickets had been sold.

In consequence of the numerous murders which have of late been committed by the administration of arsenic, the Earl of Carlisle has brought into the House of Lords a Bill to regulate the sale of that poison; while into another Bill, Lord Campbell has introduced a clause for the punishment of the criminal use of chloroform, which has been resorted to for facilitating robbery and other crimes.

From a recent statement in the London Atlas, it appears that in the whole of London, including institutions that are really metropolitan, though situated at a little distance, such as Greenwich Hospital, &c., there are 491 charitable institutions, exclusive of mere local endowments and trusts, parochial and local schools, &c. These charities annually disburse, in aid of their respective objects, the sum of £1,764,736, of which £1,000,000 is raised annually by voluntary contributions, the remainder being derived from funded property and sale of publications, &c. "SABBATH DESECRATION."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It is not my object, in this article, to enter the field as a disputant in regard to the question of "Sabbath Desecration," or to throw a straw in the way of those who choose to do so. I am, on the other hand, pleased to see the subject agitated, not only in regard to Sabbath-breaking in general, but with respect to "cheese-making" in particular; and if the position taken by the 1st Church of Alfred in regard to this matter be not correct, God grant that it may be shown, and that the Church may see their error and reform.

Your correspondent L. M. AYRES, whose communication appeared in the Recorder of March 27th, has seen fit to offer some criticism upon the reasons given by the Church above mentioned for their conduct in this matter; and as I am certain that your correspondent wishes to treat the subject fairly, I thought it proper to call his (or her) attention to the fact that the real sentiments of the article criticised do not seem to be apprehended. I will therefore re-state some of the most prominent:—

1. If a law of nature required the cutting of hay or grain on the Sabbath, then the plain inference would be, that they might be gathered also on the Sabbath. But there is no such law of nature; therefore hay and grain may not be gathered on the Sabbath. But there is a law of nature requiring us to milk our cows upon the Sabbath; therefore milk may be saved upon the Sabbath. And, farther, the question of "saving" or "gaining" is with respect to property of this kind, and not with respect to property in general, except where property in general may be exposed to loss by accident.

2. The remark in the article under consideration—"The idea that the righteousness of a certain course must not be questioned because a large majority are in favor of it"—is a glaring misstatement of the question under consideration. The remark to which reference is had is as follows:—"Against the whole system of resolutions defining the meaning of Scripture, upon which definitions discipline may be predicated, it was urged," &c.

Other points might be mentioned, but these being some of the principal, may be sufficient; only saying, let the reviewer read carefully the original articles, and observe the points where they are at issue, and then see to it that there be no raising of new issues, which is always a deceitful method of argument. NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 6.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

Arrival at Massaya—The Market—Stores—Deserted by our Guide—Torch-light Procession and Fireworks—Unexpected Intrusion at Night—Lamentations for the Dead—Grenada—Festival of the Virgin Mary—Boat foundered—Try again—Compelled to return.

A ride of four miles, through a cultivated plain, brought us to Massaya, a city with a population of about thirty thousand. An American had come out to meet us half way from Managua, to induce us to go to the house which he had fitted for our accommodation; but we went in a body to the house of a native, according to our resolution to have no more to do with our own countrymen than was unavoidable. It was about an hour before noon when we passed the plaza—the sine qua non of Spanish towns—and it was the hour when the producing classes congregate to vend their wares. Hundreds of Indian women, with blue checked skirts, little white shirts partly covering the chest, and palm-leaf hats on their heads, were offering their little stock in trade, which rarely consisted of more than a pound or two of chocolate, a small basket of corn, a grass hammock or two, a few quarts of cocoa, or a couple of calabash shells curiously wrought for dishes. The square presented a very animated appearance, though the buyers seemed few; but, as we afterward learned, they carry on an interchange of goods without the use of a circulating medium. The stores for retailing foreign goods are chiefly around the plaza, and the contents of any one of them, consisting of the cheapest kind of fancy articles, calicoes, &c., might be stowed into a common-sized cupboard. A game-cock, tied by the leg at the door of each store, was the only external sign which pointed them out.

About three miles from this town is the celebrated volcano, which bears its name, and which threatened its destruction in the latter part of the last century; since which the wells have been dry, and all the water used in the city is brought on the heads of the inhabitants, from a lake said to be formed at the time of the eruption, three miles distant, and very difficult of access on account of the volcanic rock surrounding it. Having only fifteen miles to go to reach Grenada—the terminus of our land journey—after dinner we sent for the guide to get the horses ready; but both guide and horses were missing. The former was found, after two or three hours, dressed in a clean suit, and playing the agreeable among the ladies. Some of the party were so indignant that they would have collared him sans cérémonie, but he put in his irresistible plea for time—"poco tiempo"—and we could do no better than to make the most of a delay. It was too late in the day to undertake the ascent of the volcano, and after an ineffectual attempt to descend to the lake, we resumed our sitting at the inn, and regaled ourselves with fruit, which was nowhere finer than we found here. In the evening my attention was drawn to the street by the noise of firearms and a great outcry. A large number of boys were coming down the street, with long faggots of pitchy wood on fire, which they were swinging about their heads; then followed a long procession of people, bearing torches, and firing small rockets, with which it seemed that every one was supplied; in the midst of these was borne a palanquin in which was seated the mitered head of the church. The procession passed on to the cathedral; those bearing torches entered, and the fireworks continued to whiz, blaze and snap outside. The conclusion of the ceremony in the church was announced by letting off a piece of fireworks stretching around the plaza, and exploding at the distance of every foot; and at the same time a great number of variously-colored rockets were fired simultaneously, and, starting from the same point, shot their vivid arcs over the sky. I thought it a very respectable religio-military performance. In a few moments the streets were silent as before, and I wondered whether the throng had retired with their faith strengthened, or with an increased attachment to ceremonies that captivate the senses. Certain it is, that the enthusiasm of the juvenile portion of the population in the ordnances gives a guaranty for their future life.

The room I occupied that night was a small one, having a double door opening into the street, large enough for a loaded team to enter, and had been occupied by the family; but now I was the only tenant. The room adjoining communicated with this only by the open space over the partition wall. Our landlady's daughter was lying sick there, and her moans kept me awake for some time; and when at length I had fallen asleep, I was roused by the creaking of the ponderous doors, and a man entered, bearing a large lantern on a pole, followed by a priest with shaved and uncovered head, muttering rapidly in a monotone. They passed through into the portico, and soon after I heard the same tone in the adjoining room, until sleep again overpowered me. The first sounds that greeted me in the morning were those of bereavement—the wild woe of the poor widow, whose solace had been taken from her, and the outpourings of whose heart were unrestrained by pride or religion. They were sounds to which I had become a stranger. For two years I had not seen one tear or heard one sob of grief at the death-bed or the grave.

Another guide appeared, and conducted us to Grenada. Before leaving Massaya, I purchased a scarlet macaw, or "lapa," as they are called by the natives. He was said to be gentle, but the terrible effects of his bite made me glad to part with him, after carrying him to Grenada tied at the extremity of a long pole.

Grenada is said to be the oldest town in Central America. It is near the head of Lake Nicaragua, and has more of a business aspect than any other that I visited. There were no boats to take us down the Lake, and so we took lodgings at the Spanish Hotel to wait. The most intolerable thing in this country is the cooking. Garlic is the indispensable savor, and a certain seed is added to give a brick-red color to almost every dish. A roasted monkey was served up each day at our table, and those who ate of it said it was good—though I never found it necessary to form an opinion from my own experience. Chocolate is made of a fine quality, and is prepared with ground corn to give it consistency. The day of our arrival was the anniversary of the arrival of the Virgin of Guadaloupe, and upon every house was posted a bill in large capitals—

Viva Santa Maria, Virgen de Guadaloupe

It is said that this divinity came up the river and crossed the lake in a square box, without oars or sail, and the fishermen were unable to overtake her with their boats. The evening was celebrated as was the one before it.

The next day the caritas arrived, and our party were once more together. We engaged a flat-bottomed boat then building on the lake for our party of ten. In the mean time a little schooner of nine tons arrived, and confidence being lost in the little boat, Capts. Tatim and Cathcart took passage in the schooner. The latter, for some cause, after his baggage was on board, did not wish to go, and gave to Mr. Ashby, of Mystic, his place. These two arrived at San Juan and took passage in the English steamer for Chagres, and to our great grief both died from Chagres fever soon after reaching home. When our boat was completed, our baggage was placed on board; but the captain in charge of it did not appear until the day was too far advanced to start. The next morning at daylight we found the boat swamped, with the baggage left on board. The chief damage fell upon Capt. Titcomb, whose charts, chronometers, &c., were wet. We resolved to wait for another boat to be built. Bungos of enormous size arrived and departed, carrying fifty and sixty persons, until nearly five hundred men had left to go down the lake. A novel sight it was to see the embarkation, or, rather, the packing away of returning adventurers in these enormous canoes. Monkeys, parrots, macaws, blankets, with six days' provisions in bags—O, the scene on that shore was one that is not easily forgotten. Away they went, load after load. Four of us yet remained together, determined to try another Yankee boat, to avoid the crowd and confusion of the larger ones. At length our new boat was launched, and a night was spent on the shore—(the town is a mile distant)—to be ready when the wind should be most favorable to start. The auspicious breeze came; then the master of the boat did not; when he came, the native that we had shipped for a crew had deserted. It was after noon when we were all ready to pull off from the surf. Then came our crew, with his arms full of strips of fat pork and jerked beef, and threw them in amongst us. The wind had now increased, so that the waves broke into the boat both fore and aft, and our provisions got wet. Having cleared the surf, we attempted to hoist a sail; but the rigging was incompetent, and the sail insufficient to propel the boat. The company now lost confidence in the master, and mutiny was threatening, when we voted to return. Thus ended our second attempt; and fortunate we thought ourselves in returning, for a squall came up soon after, that could hardly have failed, in our crowded state, to have sent us all to the bottom. We now bought tickets for the next trip of the schooner, to sail three days hence. The same day the bungo returned for a fresh supply of provisions, having been unable to get beyond "The Islets," a few miles distant, and the town was full of disappointed men, some of them having been out a week in open boats.

The natives were every where kind, and saluted us always in passing—even the little naked ones would say, "Good bye," as we met them, to which the reply would be as readily as any other, "Go to h—ll." This was taken in good part, as it was not understood; and it was very common for the natives to salute us kindly with such phrases as "Good bye—go to h—ll."

A few miles to the eastward of Grenada is a lofty volcano, which has a vast crater, with sharp castellated edges, and is said to contain a lake of unknown depth. I set out one day to visit the volcano, but became bewildered in the crooked paths, and seeing a nearer and smaller one, I ascended it. Its crater was a mass of irregular rocks, and had evidently been dormant since a remote period. Having crossed it, I descended on the other side. Just beyond it are several statues half buried in the earth, like those I saw in Managua, and they had evidently been worked from the rock at the base of the mountain. Returning by a circuitous route, I lost my way. The roads throughout this country are no better than cattle paths well trodden. Mine terminated at the gateway to a cottage, and I stopped to reconnoiter. Six dogs were inside, all in full cry, and more coming. A negro woman was next seen, at whose presence the dogs retreated. She expressed great surprise that I should be alone. I told her, as well as I was able, that I had been to the mountain, and that in returning I had lost my "camisa," (the Spanish word for "road" is camina; camisa means shirt,) and that I wanted to go to Grenada. She looked incredulous, and as though it would have been no great loss, for that article of apparel was badly torn and dusty from my day's adventures, but to me it was indispensable.

We remained twelve days in and about Greunda, and from the best means I had of judging of the climate, I formed a very favorable opinion. The trade winds are perpetually blowing across the lake, which purifies them from the miasm of the eastern coast, and renders the temperature uniform. I slept constantly in open hammocks, with no other covering than such as I used by day—often in the full current of wind. I saw no sickness among the many hundreds that passed through the country. Fruit was eaten to excess by all, without any bad effects, so far as I learned. Bathing in the lake is practiced daily by the natives, and it is an interesting sight to see a family group of naiads, the mother combing the hair of one, while the surf is rolling around them. The water of this lake is soft and warm, being coldest at the surface. It abounds in fish, and the beach for many miles is composed of pure black sand to the depth of several feet. The waves coming in from the lake produce a surf that often destroys the boats. The schooner returned on the morning of the 18th of December, and at 4 o'clock P. M. we were under weigh.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION MISSION.

To the Churches of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association:

Your missionary would report, that he has continued in the field since the Semi-Annual Meeting of the Association to the last of March, though he makes no claim for remuneration for time over the six months for which he was appointed. Four of the Sabbaths have been spent at Otselic, six at Preston, and two at Otego, Otsego County. Considerable of the time on first days and other week days, has been spent among those who observe the first day. In one of these places (in Pharsalia) there has been a very interesting revival. Your missionary has preached fifty-two sermons since the meeting of the Association at Lincklean, made 108 family visits, and attended eight covenant and church meetings, and some prayer meetings.

There is no great alteration at Otselic since my last report. About the same interesting state of feeling remains in the Georgetown Branch. Though I have found but one clear case of new conversion, yet a number who were in a backslidden state are now active, living Christians, and some serious old difficulties are done away.

In regard to Preston, I entertained very sanguine hopes, that after the original difficulty between the two brethren was settled, the old division in the Church would be healed. But, in pursuing my labors with them, I discovered, to my full satisfaction, that there were a few, who would not agree to travel with the Church, let them do what they might. Since that, we have endeavored to get as many into union and fellowship as we could, hoping to be guided by divine counsel in regard to our duty towards the rest.

At Otego, there was no hope of getting Christians to work harmoniously together for a revival without a long course of labor, which I could not stay to perform. The great difficulty is a diversity of sentiment about doctrines and measures. I am not without hope, however, that the precious seed may some time or other bring forth fruit to the glory of God.

I spent two evenings in Sydney—had very interesting meetings, but the anti-effort doctrine is there too. There are, however, many warm-hearted Christians who mourn over it. I hope their prayers will prevail.

I have received nothing more from Otselic. At Preston I have received, since my last report, $2 57, and from others $1 50. If any more should be paid in I will give an account of it at the Association, and whatever else may be necessary. Though what Preston has done for the six months past, is rather small, yet they have resolved to sustain me for one half of the time for the year to come, without asking aid from other churches. Otselic and vicinity have subscribed about fifty dollars for the other half, expecting, from what was said at the Association, that the Association will assist in sustaining me. And I concluded to say, that if the churches approved of the course, the Association may make up what it sees fit for the half of my time in Otselic. If any of the churches disapprove, I hope they will write to me, and let me know as soon as may be. I receive my letters at South Otselic, Chenango Co., N. Y. Both of these churches would appear, from the minutes, to have much more strength than they really have, on account of members moving away and not removing their membership. This ought not to be. I hope such members will change their memberships to the churches where they live. All of which is respectfully submitted. ELIAS BURDICK.

April 1st, 1851.

DEDICATION.—The new Seventh-day Baptist Meeting-House at Greenmanville, Conn., was consecrated to the worship of God, April 3d. An appropriate sermon was preached by Bro. Lucius Crandall, from Gen. 28:22—"And this stone . . . . . shall be God's house." The choir of the Waterford Church kindly assisted in the exercises, singing several anthems well adapted to the occasion. The house is chaste in its architecture; its gallery over the vestibule has folding doors in front, so that it can easily be converted into an elegant room for conference or prayer. The speaker's desk is a slightly elevated platform, capable of seating some ten persons; in front of the desk is a large area—the whole making a spacious, unincumbered place in and around the pulpit. C. Maxson & Co., of Westerly, R.I., were the builders. This infant church was organized in August last, and promises soon to be strong and vigorous. By its constitution it holds no fellowship with slavery, with the traffic in or use of intoxicating drink, or with Secret Societies, and it maintains congregational singing. COMM.

REVIVAL IN WATSON.—God in his merciful providence has seen fit to revive his work in Watson, Lewis Co., N. Y. He prepared the way by his afflictive providence. At this juncture, Elder Call, a traveling minister, came into the place, and held a series of meetings. The word spoken immediately took effect, and brought forth fruit, in the refreshing of God's people, the reclaiming of the wanderer, and the conversion of sinners. Twenty-three have been added to the Church by baptism, and more are expected. Several have been restored to the church, and some have united from sister churches, making in all thirty who have joined of late. The work has spread into other parts of the town, and many sinners have submitted to the yoke of Christ. A number of difficulties of long standing have been adjusted, and the leaven is still at work. Pray for us, that the work may go on, until all shall know and serve the Lord. HIRAM W. BABCOCK.

ARRIVAL OUT OF MISSIONARIES.—The ship Washington Allston, Capt. Richardson, which sailed from this port July 25, for Maulmain, with a large number of Missionaries, arrived at Amherst, mouth of the river Salwen, Jan. 22. The following are the names of the Missionaries on board: Rev. Messrs. J. Wade, and wife; J. H. Vinton. wife, and two children; E. Kincaid, wife and three children; M. Bronson, wife and child; Wm. Ware, and wife; S. M. Whiting, and wife; Dr. John Dawson, wife and two children; Mrs. O. T. Cutter; Miss M. S. Shaw; Miss McBain; Masters Lucien Hayden and James Tripp, (two Assamese;) and Miss Barbori, (an Assamese girl.)

THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—At the monthly meeting of the Board, held on the 4th inst., Hon. Luther Bradish presiding, interesting letters were presented from several missionaries in China, in regard to the new version of the Chinese Scriptures, and a circular from England on the same subject. Grants were made to the Presbyterian Board of Missions; to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church; to the American Sunday School Union; and to the Baptist Seminary at Rochester, N. Y. A grant was also made to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of $1,000, to aid their missionaries in publishing the Scriptures in China.

HELP FOR JAMAICA.—The Baptist churches in Jamaica have suffered dreadfully from the visitation of Cholera; and it is feared that in many cases ministers and people have suffered privations even to the verge of destitution. The Committee of the English Missionary Society asked for aid to a "Cholera Fund;" up to the middle of last month upwards of £1,600 had been contributed. "No pastor in Jamaica has been overlooked in the distribution," say the Committee. The once flourishing Jamaica Mission, it is feared, is wrecked.

WIDOWS AND CHILDREN OF DECEASED MISSIONARIES.— The British correspondent of the Independent says that the Directors of the London Missionary Society recently made a special appeal to the churches in behalf of a fund for Widows and Orphans, suggesting that a sacramental collection should be made, the excess above the average of the monthly collection to be appropriated to this fund. The Directors now acknowledge the receipt of £1,400 so raised.

REVIVAL IN NEW HAVEN.—The New Haven Palladium says that meetings have been held in the Methodist Church in that city for two months or more, as a result of which about three hundred and fifty persons have professed religion, and about two hundred united with the Church. On one Sunday seventy-six persons were baptized by the pastor. The St. John-street M. E. Church has had a large accession of members. In the Second Baptist Church, a revival has been in progress and a large number have joined the society.

MRS. JUDSON'S RETURN.— Letters from Maulmain state that Mrs. Judson was to leave for Calcutta in January, whence she would sail for the United States via England. Some friends at Calcutta, as a testimony of regard and of their respect for the memory of her lamented husband, spontaneously raised a sum of money to provide for her return voyage in the most agreeable route and in the most comfortable way, without increased expense to the Missionary Union. She will probably arrive in May or early in June. So says the Macedonian.

MR. REMINGTON AND THE BIBLE UNION.—Rev. Stephen Remington, of New York, has resigned his seat in the Board of the American Bible Union, giving as his principal reason, the fact that the Union has not confined its attention to the procuring of an English translation, (the object which alone he thinks justified its formation,) but has made appropriations for the foreign field, thus coming into collision with the American and Foreign Bible Society.

BIBLE CONTRIBUTIONS AMONG THE BAPTISTS.—Fears have frequently been expressed that the organization of the American Bible Union (the new-version society) would operate unfavorably on the receipts of the American and Foreign Bible Society. But such seems not to have been the case; for it is now stated, that the receipts of the latter society for the year ending with March, exceeded those of the previous year by a considerable amount.

BAPTIST MISSION RECEIPTS.—The contributions to the Baptist Missionary Union for the month of March were $37,920 37, making the whole amount for the year, from all sources, a little more than $120,000, or upwards of $15,000 more than the whole amount received the year ending with March, 1850.

REVIVAL AT MILLBURY, MASS.—A correspondent of the Congregationalist gives some account of a revival at Millbury, Mass., in the progress of which the whole town has been moved, as it never was before; the Baptist, Methodist, and three Congregational churches, have been greatly refreshed and strengthened; about 200 converts are numbered, from the age of 81 to the child of 10 years.

THE REVIVAL AT SHILOH, N. J.—Six persons were baptized at Shiloh, N. J., on Sabbath, 5th inst., making twenty-four recently baptized in that church. Eleven have been baptized at the Marlboro Church.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

The steamer Africa arrived at New York on the 10th inst., bringing Liverpool dates to March 29th.

The Papal Aggression Bill has passed to a second reading in the House of Commons by a very large majority, and will no doubt be as successful on the final trial.

Lord John Russell has brought in his bill for the Reform of the Court of Chancery, and a very faint and moderate reform it is.

Lord Lyndhurst, in the House of Lords, has called up the subject of the Revolutionary Societies of Italians, Germans and Hungarians in England. He thought something ought to be done to check their operations. Earl Grey, in behalf of the Government, replied that they had been thinking of it, and if new laws were absolutely wanting, they might ask for them.

A letter from Stockholm, of March 1st, states that the Committee charged by the General Diet of the Kingdom to examine the propositions for granting to the Jews the same civil and political rights as are enjoyed by other subjects not belonging to the Lutheran Church, has decided by a large majority in favor of the motion. Five of the members of the Committee have proposed the complete emancipation of Swedish Jews.

The court martial of Padua, Italy, on the 8th ult., sentenced the curate of Ceregnano, in the province of Poliessine, to two years' arrest in a fortress, for having, on the 18th August, 1850, being the birthday of the Emperor, neglected to read after mass the prayer for the preservation and prosperity of his Imperial Majesty. The sentence was confirmed by the military commandant of the city and province of Padua on the 10th, and received immediate execution.

A large expedition left Manilla in December last for the purpose of chastising the pirates of the Archipelago in their stronghold at Mindanao, and at the same time to subject Suloo to the Spanish yoke. This attempt to subjugate Suloo has most signally failed.

Twenty Days Later from California.

Two steamers from Chagres have arrived since our last, bringing a large number of passengers, one million five hundred thousand dollars in gold dust, and California news to March 5th.

From the Isthmus we have news that three of the murderers of the passengers on the boat on the Chagres river had been arrested, tried, and sentenced to be shot. The captain of the band of robbers who attacked the train of Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall, not long since, was also under sentence of death.

There was much excitement at Panama on the 20th of March, caused by a report that the British Silver Train had been robbed. There was over $1,000,000, and some of the reports represented the whole of it as being captured by the robbers. The facts of the case, however, proved to be, that only one mule was taken, and being led into the wood was shot, when the robbers took possession of his load; but after carrying the silver bars some half a mile they found them too heavy, and had to abandon them. The silver was recovered, but no clue has been obtained of the robbers.

The Legislature of California has failed to elect a Senator in the place of Col. Fremont. After one hundred and forty-four ballots, the Joint Convention in effect adjourned sine die.

The general tenor of the news from the interior of California is decidedly favorable to the miners. The Quartz Mines are being worked with much success, and the stories heretofore published of the richness of the placers at Trinidad Bay are corroborated by this arrival. Miners were going to the Gold Bluff in great numbers.

In Sacramento City there has been a painful tragedy enacted. A desperado engaged in a street brawl, wantonly took the life of an inoffensive by-stander, was arrested, tried by a People's Jury under the Lynch Code, and immediately hung.

A similar scene was near being enacted in San Francisco. There, also, a People's Jury tried a person accused of an attempt to commit murder, but luckily three of the Jury were possessed of consciences, and resisted the demands of the populace. Their firmness saved the life of the culprit, and he was eventually handed over to the officers of justice, to be legally tried.

A gang of thieves, detected in stealing horses at Foster's Bar, were fired at by the miners, and one of them killed. Two others were taken prisoners, and immediately hung!

At Napa City, the miners lynched a man who had killed a Justice of the Peace.

An Indian, at Dobbin's Ranch, was severely horsewhipped by the miners for stealing a calf.

A Mexican, by the name of Antonio Torres, who was caught stealing a cloak from the store of Mr. Huntingdon, at San Francisco, came very near being lynched by the enraged citizens. He was, however, taken from their custody, after a desperate struggle, and carried off to the station house.

Thomas Jones was detected in carrying off two ducks from the Central House in San Francisco. A crowd immediately gathered around, and were about to inflict summary punishment, when they were restrained by the approach of Officer Eadie, who took the offender into custody, and marched him off to the calaboose.

The Sacramento Times says, on the authority of a gentleman from Redding's Diggings, that a large number of miners have perished in the snow upon the mountains in that vicinity, a heavy fall of snow having covered men and mules as they were crossing the mountains.

The marshes between Sacramento City and Maysville are covered with the finest ducks and geese. The miner unstraps his rifle from his shoulder as he passes, and soon bags a sufficient number to make a hearty meal for his party.

They are amusing themselves with races at Sacramento City. On the 3d of March they had a poney race, a donkey race, and a trial of speed between two full-blooded California horses.

A man who was fined $40 in the Recorder's Court at San Francisco, for a misdemeanor, very coolly offered to give his note for one month as payment of the fine! The Recorder referred him to the Marshal, and the Marshal referred him to the "lock up."

A man was lately fined $100 for being drunk and disorderly in the streets of San Francisco. The Courier says: "A good smart murder might have been committed last week for that money."

The Recorder of San Francisco lately sentenced a Mexican to ten days hard labor in the chain gang. When the hombre began to understand the sentence, he asked to be let off on the payment of $10 in cash. It had been so long since a ten dollar piece had jingled in the city treasury, that the magistrate commuted the punishment at once for the coin.

Agriculture, which has bitherto been a very subordinate interest in California, now bids fair to assume its proper position in relation to any prosperous community. The high prices of agricultural produce of all kinds have induced large numbers to undertake the cultivation of the earth, and the fertile lands of the river bottoms and valleys are being rapidly settled by industrious and energetic farmers. The prospects for an abundant yield of every description of produce were very excellent, until the long continued and unusual drought has induced apprehensions that the crops in many parts will be a total failure.

The Placer Times tells of three brothers who crossed the Plains in October, 1849. One went to the mines, the other two turned their attention to agriculture. The miner, at the end of January, 1851, had saved less than $1,000, while the farmers had netted $9,000 each.

RELIGIOUS EXCITEMENT AT MILWAUKEE.—There was much excitement at Milwaukee, Wis., last week, growing of the anti papist lectures of Rev. Mr. Leahey, the reformed monk of Latrappe. He was advertised to lecture on Sunday evening, March 6th. A large crowd assembled, about a third of them females. He had not spoken five minutes when there was a rush at the door, and a gang of men came in armed with clubs, and they tore off the rails from the pews and laid about them with great violence; several persons were struck on the head and badly injured—the scene was one of the wildest confusion—pews were torn down, chandeliers smashed, and the shouts of the rioters and screams of the women were fearful. The audience gradually got out of the windows and doors; some few persons stood around the speaker and protected him. The Mayor commanded peace, and promised that Mr. Leahey should leave the town in the morning. The crowd did not disperse till a late hour, and many persons followed the preacher and his escort to the hotel, breaking with brickbats some of the windows. Subsequently letters were sent to the Mayor, threatening to tear down the church if Mr. Leahey was allowed to speak there again. Letters were also sent to the proprietors of the City Hotel, threatening to fire the building unless Mr. L. was discharged. A very numerous law-and-order meeting was held, at which the expression of public opinion against the rioters was so overwhelming as to hold them in check.

CHINA AND JAPAN.—The Boston Courier learns from Capt. Jennings, of the bark Auckland, which arrived in that port March 6, in 70 days from China, that about 500 miles off the coast of Japan, he fell in with a Japanese junk, which was completely water-logged. The crew, consisting of 17 persons, were taken off by Capt. Jennings, and are now on board his vessel. They had been 50 days on the wreck, and were in great distress, having exhausted their provisions. No communication, of course, had been had with them, beyond what could be accomplished by signs, but they appear exceedingly grateful for the assistance and kind treatment received from the Captain. On approaching land, they exhibited striking evidences of joy and devotion. A box belonging to them, which they have presented to Capt. Jennings, contains what are probably the junk's register, &c., a chart, which we understand to be a very curious affair, and a compass differing entirely from those in use among us, and some gold and silver Japanese coins. This would seem to afford a good opportunity for attempting to open an intercourse with Japan. These persons should be well treated, and sent back in one of our ships of war, the commander of which should be authorized to make overtures to the Japanese Government.

FORTUNATE ESCAPE.—The most providential escape that we know or have ever known says the Alexandria (Va.) Gazette, occured on Saturday last in this place. A house in New York had shipped on board the schooner Empire, Capt. Bunker, a box of oil clothing, to Mr. John Tatsapough, which the bill of lading described as merchandize. It was stowed in the hold, and upon it were placed seventeen kegs of powder, and around it some three hundred more. The Empire cleared at New York on Monday afternoon, 1st inst., and arrived at this port on Friday, making the passage in five days. Upon opening the box it was found that the clothing was completely charred through, and the box much scorched, from spontaneous combustion! Had the box remained in the hold a few hours longer, it is probable that a fearful explosion would have been the consequence.

SLAVE-HUNTING IN WISCONSIN.—The Milwaukee Democrat says that a slave-hunter has been prowling about the habitations of the colored people in that city in search of prey. He entered the dwelling of a colored person, and questioned the woman very closely, asking her if she and her husband were free, and if they were not related to some other person named. The Democrat thinks that if the husband had been at home there would have been work for a Coroner's inquest, had the slave-catcher been as impertinent to him as he was to his wife. The colored men go armed, although they have no occasion for alarm, the people of Wisconsin being almost unanimous in their opposition to kidnapping and slave-catching.

The new ship E. C. Scranton, 1250 tons burden, launched on the 1st inst., from the yard of Messrs. Geo. Greenman & Co., of Greenmanville, Ct., was towed to this city last week. She is spoken of as a very fine vessel.

JENNY LIND AND THE SUNDAY.—The Baltimore (Md.) Watchman and Observer, in announcing the fact that Miss Lind refused to violate the Sunday by traveling on that day, says:—

"Jenny Lind either did not refuse, or else her refusal availed nothing, to leave this city on Saturday night with the design of traveling on Sunday. These are parallel cases, and we set the one against the other. It is very possible, however, that the danger to which she and her attendants were subjected on their way to Charleston, in consequence of Sunday traveling, may have had its influence in preventing her leaving New Orleans on Sunday. If so, she is to be commended, for the heed which she has given to the indications of Providence."

BOILER EXPLOSION.— Fourteen persons were killed at Stockport, near Liverpool, on the 17th ult., by the explosion of a boiler in Mr. Moreland's cotton factory. The boiler, a huge cylinder, 40 feet long and about 12 inches in diameter, weighing 11 tuns, and having its fire in the center of one end, suddenly gave way from the pressure of steam it contained, rose from the immense bed of brickwork in which it had been fixed, and shot like an arrow a distance of from 40 to 45 yards, through a wall of immense thickness, about twelve feet, destroying a large portion of the building, and causing portions of the floors and machinery to fall through on the top of it. To add to the calamity, before many of the hands not killed could be extricated, the boiler, which carried a mass of fire with it, set the building in flames, and these spreading, completed the work of destruction.

THE BRAZILIAN SLAVE TRADE.—Private advices from Rio Janeiro say: "The Government is periling its very existence in its efforts to suppress the Slave Trade. The once notorious slave steamer, the Serpente, (now the Golfinho of the Brazilian navy,) has made several captures. Last week she carried off 200 newly-imported negroes from the island of Marambala. They are supposed to have belonged to Joaquim Breves, the well-known and opulent slave dealer. This man is the owner of ten large farendas, and the master of some 2,500 slaves. His large possessions give him great political influence, and this seizure of his slaves shows plainly the energy and determination of the Government.

SUMMARY.

The National Intelligencer announces the death of the Hon. Ransom Halloway, late a member of the 31st Congress from the State of New York, who died at Mount Pleasant, in Prince George's County, Maryland, whither he had gone on a visit to his wife's relations, prior to his return home, on the night of the 6th inst., of typhoid fever and inflammation of the bowels, after an illness of about two weeks.

The prisoners lately taken by the Turks among the insurgents in Bosnia, were marched from Belgrade under escort, bound together by twenties, with a heavy chain, some two inches in diameter, fastened to an iron ring around the neck of each. Those at each end of the chain had big padlocks on their breasts, with which the chain was fastened. So heavy was the chain, that each prisoner had to hold up his piece in order not to be dragged by the others to the ground.

A dispatch dated Pittsburg, Pa., Thursday, April 10, says the ex-Mayor was convicted to-day of riot and misdemeanor while in office, and was sentenced to five months' imprisonment, beside paying a fine of $3,000. Before the Judge sentenced him, Mr. Barker harangued a large crowd from the Court-House steps, abusing the Judges and lawyers without stint. His friends now promise to make him Sheriff.

A dispatch dated Detroit, Wednesday, April 10, says: The gallant and venerable Gen. Hugh Brady, of that city, is dead. He was killed a few moments since by a fall from his carriage in the upper part of this city, He was upward of 80 years of age, and universally beloved.

On Sixth-day morning, April 11, a fire broke out in a store at the corner of John-st. and Broadway, New York, which was not subdued until property to the value of $350,000 had been destroyed. Messrs. Hudson and Robertson, in whose store the fire originated, were the principal losers.

The force engaged in the completion of the Erie Railroad is large at various points, and the track will be completed within the contemplated time, as the extensions of the Erie Road always have been. Regular trains will doubtless run over the whole track from the Hudson to Lake Erie during the first week in May.

A Joint Committee of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to whom the subject was referred, estimate the value of the present annual yield of the coal-mines of Pennsylvania at $17,000,000, and the annual product of furnaces, forges and rolling-mills, at not less than $28,000,000.

Major Freas, of the Germantown Telegraph, recently recovered $22 50 from Jacob Haas, for twelve years subscription to his paper. The defendant did n't wish to "pay up," because the paper had been left at his butcher-stall, instead of his residence.

The Emperor of Russia has presented to the King of Prussia the chain of brilliants belonging to the order of St. Andrew. The order itself the Emperor retains. The chain is worth a million thalers, ($720,000.)

C., prescribing a penalty of $1,000 against the captain of any vessel, or other person, who shall be instrumental in introducing a pauper or vagrant into that town, and a penalty of $5,000 against the corporation or owner of a vessel, steamboat, or railroad, who shall be guilty of the same offense.

The Erie Railroad is rapidly approaching completion. One half the section between Cuba, the present western terminus, and Dunkirk, is completed, the iron being all laid. The iron on the remaining half of the section, if not already laid, will be in a few days.

The Rio Grande Sentinel, of the 5th inst., states that "one of the men—the leader—who robbed the party of three Californians, some eight months since," was recently "shot from his horse, near a place known as Los Portreras, where he had been circulating threats of vengeance against his accusers." After being secured, he was "suspended to the limb of a neighboring tree, by the neck, and in that condition left as a warning to others."

The Toledo Blade states that the Lake is gradually falling to its minimum level—an event that occurs, it thinks, every twelve or fourteen years. The stage of water in the river at Toledo is considerable lower now than it has been in any previous year since 1837, when the water in the Bay was barely sufficient to float the larger class of steam vessels afloat at that time.

Obadiah Archer died at his residence in Marion, Wayne Co., on the 7th inst. He was in the 92d year of his age, went through three campaigns in the Revolution, voted at every Presidential election from the organization of the government—first for George Washington and last for Zachary Taylor.

Married, in Cambridge, Mass., 2d instant, Mr. S. W. Dabney, of Fayal, Azores, and Miss Harriet W., daughter of the late Professer Webster, of Cambridge.

MARRIED.

In Lincklaen, N. Y., March 8th, by Eld. R. G. Burdick, Mr. CHARLES ROGERS, of Otselic, to Miss CLARINDA E. DYE, of Lincklaen.

DIED.

In Alfred, N. Y., April 7th, of apoplexy, Mrs. SARAH LANGWORTHY, wife of Dea. John Langworthy, in the seventy-fourth year of her age. In her youth sister Langworthy became a subject of saving grace, and united with a first-day Baptist Church. Soon after this she embraced the Sabbath of our God, and united with the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, R. I., of which she remained a member for a number of years. But on the organization of the Church at Hopkinton City, or soon after, she united with that Church. A number of years since, she removed with her husband to Alfred, Allegany County, whither several of their children had previously removed. On settling in the vicinity of the second Church of Alfred, she with her husband united with said Church, of which she remained a faithful and devoted member until her death. It is not too much to say of this mother in Israel, that in every situation in life she manifested in a remarkable degree the graces of our holy religion, and by her sweetness of temper and amiableness of disposition lastingly endeared herself to all that knew her. N. V. H.

In Lincklaen, N. Y., March 27, 1851, ELMINA E. WHITFORD, wife of Wm. C. Whitford, in the 23d year of her age. The death of sister Whitford is one of those mysterious providences that are so inscrutable to our earth-beclouded vision. She had long and sedulously labored to qualify herself for usefulness, and was intending to offer herself to the Board as a recruit to our foreign mission. But God's ways are not as our ways. Early in the past summer there were indications of declining health, but her case was not regarded as alarming till late in autumn. Then a change of atmosphere seemed a last hope, and brother W. left college and accompanied her to the prairies. The fatal malady had, however, become so strongly intrenched, that no change was of permanent benefit. She returned only in time to die and be buried with her kindred. Death was disrobed of its terror, and though she had looked on the mission as an inviting field, she could cheerfully forego the privilege of leading the heathen to Christ, for the higher privilege of being with Christ and celebrating his praises with the redeemed in the blissful abodes of perennial glory. May her life and death be as seed sown in the garden of our God! J. R. I.

In Waterford, Conn., on the 7th inst., at the residence of her son-in-law, Dea. David Rogers, Mrs. MARY MAXSON, widow of Asa Maxson of Adams, N. Y., and also relict of George Potter, of Westerly, R. I., in the 90th year of her age. She embraced religion in early life, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., and has ever manifested a deep interest in the prosperity of Zion. Having spent a long life in the service of her Redeemer, she has at last been gathered home, as a shock of corn fully ripe.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. EDWARDS, E. A. PARK, and M. STUART, of Andover; Dr. ROBINSON and H. B. SMITH, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism. Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has been received in the short time which has elapsed since the union was made public, and the universal approbation of the measure which the publisher is daily receiving through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

TERMS.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the BIBLIOTHECA SACRA, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf, with marbled edges, at $25 00.

☞ Orders should be addressed to

Miscellaneous.

Visit to an English Dairy.

A writer in Dickens' Household Words gives a graphic sketch of a visit made by him to an English Dairy Farm, in the neighborhood of London, on "a bright sunny morning in September." "An enormous green and sloping pasturage," he found "covered all over with cows" to the number of from two to three hundred, with almost every variety of horn, color, and appearance. The writer thus continues:—

We will now descend this broad and populous slope, and pay a visit to Friern Manor Dairy Farm, to which all these acres—some two hundred and fifty—belong, together with all these "horned beauties." We find them all very docile, and undisturbed by our presence, though their looks evidently denote that they recognize a stranger. But those who are reclining do not rise, and none of them decline to be caressed by the hand, or seem indifferent to the compliments addressed to them. In passing through the cows, we were specially presented to the cow queen, or "master cow," as she is called. This lady has been recognized during twelve years as the sovereign ruler over all the rest. No one, however large, disputes her supremacy. She is a short-horned, short-legged cow, looking at first sight rather small, but on a closer examination you will find that she is sturdily and solidly built, though graceful withal. "She is very sweet-tempered," observed the head keeper, "but when a new-comer doubts about who is the master, her eye becomes dreadful. Do n't signify how big the cow is—she must give in to the master cow. It 's not her size, nor her strength, bless you, it 's her spirit. As soon as the question is once settled, she 's as mild as a lamb again—gives us eighteen quarts of milk a day."

We were surprised to hear of so great a quantity, but this was something abated by a consideration of the rich, varied, and abundant supply of food afforded to these cows, besides the air, attendance, and other favorable circumstances. For their food they have mangoldwurtzel, both the long red and the orange globe sorts, parsnips, turnips, and kohl-rabi, (Jewish cabbage,) a curious kind of green turnip, with cabbage leaves sprouting out at the top all round, like the feathery arms of the Prince of Wales. Of this last mentioned vegetable the cows often eat greedily; and sometimes endeavoring to bolt too large a piece, it sticks in their throats and threatens strangulation. On these occasions, one of the watchful keepers rushes to the rescue with a thing called a probang, (in fact a cow's throat ramrod,) with which he rams down the obstructive morsel. But, besides the articles of food, there is the unlimited eating of grass in the pastures, so that the yield of a large quantity of milk seems only a matter of course, though we were not prepared to hear of its averaging from twelve to eighteen and twenty quarts of milk a day, from each of these two or three hundred cows. Four-and-twenty quarts a day is not an unusual occurrence from some of the cows; and one of them, we were assured by several of the keepers, once yielded the enormous quantity of twenty-eight quarts a day during six or seven weeks. The poor cow, however, suffered for this munificence, for she was taken very ill with a fever, and her life was given over by the doctor. Mr. Wright, the proprietor, told us that he sat up two nights with her himself, as he had such a respect for the cow; and in the morning of the second night after she was given over, when the butcher came for her, he could n't find it in his heart to let him have her. "No, butcher," said he, "she 's been a good friend to me, and I 'll let her die a quiet, natural death." She hung her head, and her horns felt very cold, and so she lay for some time longer; but he nursed her, and was rewarded, for she recovered; and there she stands—the strawberry Durham short-horn—and yields him again from sixteen to eighteen quarts of milk a day.

Reverting to the "master cow," we inquired whether her supremacy in the case of new-comers was established "mesmerically," by a glance—or how? The eye, we were assured, had a great deal to do with it. The stranger cow read it, and trembled. But, sometimes, there was a contest; and a cow-fight, with such fresh, strong creatures as these—all used to their full liberty, and able to run or leap well—was a serious affair. If no keeper was at hand to separate them, and the fight got serious, so that one of them fell wounded, it was a chance but the whole herd would surround the fallen cow, and kill her. This was not out of wickedness, but something in the whole affair that put them beside themselves, and they could n't bear the horrid sight, and so tried to get rid of their feelings, as well as the unfortunate object, by this wild violence. The effect was the same if the herd did not witness the fight, but came suddenly to the discovery of blood that had been spilled. They would stare at it, and glare at it, and snuff down at it, and sniff up at it, and prowl round it, and get more and more excited, till, at last, the whole herd would begin to rush about the field bellowing and mad, and make nothing at last of leaping clean over hedges, fences, and five-barred gates.

Instead of proceeding directly down the sloping field toward the Dairy Farm, we made a detour of about half a mile, and passed through a field well inclosed, in which were about a dozen cows, attended by one man, who sat beneath a tree. This was the Quarantine ground. All newly-purchased cows, however healthy they may appear, are first placed in this field during four or five weeks, and the man who milks or attends upon them is not permitted to touch, nor indeed, to come near, any of the cows in the great pasture. Such is the susceptibility of a cow to the least contamination, that if one who had any slight disease were admitted among the herd, in a very short time the whole of them would be affected. When the proprietor has been to purchase fresh stock, and been much among strange cows, especially at Smithfield, he invariably changes all his clothes, and generally takes a bath, before he ventures among his own herd.

From what has already been seen, the reader will not be astonished on his arrival with us at the Dairy Farm, to find every arrangement in accordance with the fine condition of the cows, and the enviable (to all other cows) circumstances in which they live. The cow-sheds are divided into fifty stalls, each; and the appearance presented reminded me of the neatness and order of cavalry stables. Each stall is marked with a number, a corresponding number is marked on one horn of the cow to whom it belongs; and, in winter time, or any inclement season (for they all sleep out in fine weather) each cow finds out, and walks into her own stall. No. 173 once got into the stall of No. 15; but in a few minutes, No. 15 arrived and "showed her the difference." In winter, when the cows are kept very much in doors, they are all regularly groomed with curry-combs. By the side of one of these sheds there is a cottage where the keepers live—milkers and attendants—each with little iron bedsteads, all in orderly soldier fashion, the foreman's wife acting as the housekeeper.

These men lead a comfortable life, but they work hard. The first "milking begins at eleven o'clock at night; and the second, at half past one in the morning. It takes a long time, for each cow insists upon being milked in her own pail—i. e., a pail to herself, containing no milk of any other cow—or, if she sees it, she is very likely to kick it over. She will not allow of any mixture. In this there would seem a strange instinct, accordant with her extreme susceptibility of contamination.

The milk is all passed through several strainers, and then placed in great tin cans, barred across the top and sealed. They are deposited in a van, which starts from the Farm about three in the morning, and arrives at the dairy, in Farringdon-street, London, between three and four. The seals are then carefully examined, and taken off by a clerk. In come the carriers, commonly called "milkmen," all wearing the badge of Friern Farm Dairy; their tin pails are filled, fastened at top, and sealed as before, and away they go on their early rounds, to be in time for the early-breakfast people. The late breakfasts are provided by a second set of men.

Destruction of the Wire-Worm.

Prof. Mapes, in the Working Farmer, says:

"We have continually urged the use of six bushels of common salt to the acre, as a preventive against grubs, wire-worms, &c., and our practice has been to use this quantity on every acre of our land each year, applying it broadcast, either in the fall or early spring. Since adopting this practice, we have never lost a melon vine or cabbage plant by grubs, and wire-worms are unknown with us. Old pastures thus salted in early spring, are materially improved, both in quality and quantity of product. In addition to the use of salt as a preventive of insects and of a large class of weeds, its ultimate constituents (chlorine and soda) add permanently to the value of the soil, by supplying these necessary ingredients. For the use of many plants, soda answers the same purposes as potash does with others, while chlorine assists the decomposition of inert vegetable matters by its combination with any or all the alkalies present."

Mr. C. W. Johnson, in the London Farmer's Magazine, says:—

"It is now some years since some successful and valuable experiments were reported by a Norfolk farmer upon the uses of the rape-cake drilled with the seed, in preventing the ravages and destroying the wire-worm—an insect perhaps the most tenacious of life of any with which we have to contend. This plan was also very successfully tried by the late Lord Albemarle, in Norfolk. And again, M. J. M. Charnock, of York, has given an account of its beneficial use in Yorkshire. He says that he received his account from his relative—Mr. Charles Charnock, of Holmfield House—who himself received it from Sir William Cooke. Some few years after his entry on his farm, Mr. Charnock was complaining, in the presence of Sir William Cooke, of the injury his crops had sustained from wire-worms, and lamenting that there was no known way of destroying them. Sir William then informed him that he had heard of and adopted a plan which had proved perfectly effective—a plan which Mr. Charnock subsequently followed with the same success. The plan was as follows:—In lieu of the ordinary top-dressing with rape-dust, apply to the land, and plow or harrow well in, five cwt. per acre of rape-cake crushed into lumps of about the size of half-inch ground bones, and the result will be that the wire-worm will congregate on these lumps of cake, devouring them with such avidity as to become glutted, and perish either from repletion or from the peculiar properties of the rape, or, perhaps, from the combined effects of the two. Rape-dust will not answer the purpose, because it presents no surface upon which the worms can fix themselves, and no substance into which they can eat their way. Perceiving that a satisfactory result was being attained in the first field in which the cake was applied, Mr. Charnock took up and examined many of the lumps, and found them full of the dead or expiring wire-worms. The practice was followed throughout the farm where the worm prevailed, until, in a year or two, the land was entirely freed, and that without any recurrence of the evil. It seems that Mr. Charnock has, on several occasions since then, had recourse to the same means of preserving his carnations, (which are plants very liable to be attacked by the wire-worm,) and he has invariably witnessed the same satisfactory result. The soils of Mr. Charnock and Sir W. Cooke, on which these trials were made, are dry lands on the magnesian limestone. The soils on which those of Lord Albemarle were carried on were the light turnip soils of Norfolk; but, as Mr. Charnock adds, we see no reason for supposing that it would not be equally efficacious in other soils."

Lunar Rainbow.—An instance of this phenomenon, not a common one, was presented on Sunday evening, March 16th. We first saw it a quarter after ten. The moon was about 30 degrees southeast of the zenith, as near as we could judge. Two circles, about 40 degrees in diameter, surrounded the moon, intersecting each other at the northwest and southeast, their centres varying perhaps two degrees. At the points of intersection, the colors of the rainbow, elsewhere invisible, were very vivid, and appeared in two parallel straight lines, parallel also with the plane of the horizon. The night was slightly hazy and perfectly free from wind, rain, or snow. The temperature was quite moderate. By eleven o'clock, the prismatic colors were gone, leaving only two ordinary halos, in the place of the circles first observed. [Burlington Courier.

Butter.

Milk is the most natural and common food of man. Out of milk two other common articles of food are obtained, viz., cheese and butter; butter exists in the form of very small globules, and out of 100 parts of cow's milk, 3.75 parts of butter are obtained. Human milk contains about one-sixth more butter than the above. Butter is indebted to a substance called "butyrine" for its fine flavor. Casein, the cheesy matter of the milk, if not well removed from the butter, by working and washing, soon putrifies, and gives the butter a bad taste. Butter does not appear to have been known to the ancients, at least so far as history reveals knowledge, but we cannot believe that butter was not known to them for all this. We read of "a land flowing with milk and honey," but no butter, still this is not conclusive against the reasonable conclusion that the old Hebrews did know what it was. The oldest hint, historically, about butter, is given by Herodotus, who ascribes the use of it to the Scythians. Hippocrates also alludes to the Scythian butter, and recommends its use externally for medicine. In the time of Galen, butter was known and used, but to a very limited extent, among the Greeks and Romans; in the second century Pliny ascribes the invention of butter to the Germans, but this only shows that the Romans became acquainted with it through the Germans.

It was much used as a pomatum both by the Greek and Roman ladies. Pliny recommends it to be mixed with honey and rubbed over the gums to ease the pain of teething, and for ulcers in the mouth—a hint that may not be useless to us moderns. The Romans anointed the bodies of their children with butter to make them pliable, and it appears that they did not know butter as we do, in firm cakes, but only as a semi-fluid, like thick olive oil. This is not wonderful, owing to the general warmth of Southern Italy. Neither the Spaniards or the Portuguese know much about butter, and the inhabitants of Mexico seldom eat it. In the city of Mexico it costs one dollar per pound; the most wealthy classes do not use so much of it as the poorest amongst us; in fact they do not consider it an essential article of food—we do, and could not, to use a common phrase, "live without it." It is justly believed that more butter is consumed in the Northern States of America than in any other country having the same amount of population in the world. The Hollanders are distinguished for making good butter, so also are the Northern Germans, Norwegians, and Danes. The English, Irish and Scotch, make and consume a good deal of butter, especially the Scotch, who are, or at least were, almost half Jewish in their feelings toward the use of pork and lard.

The great secret of making good butter, is cleanliness and plenty of elbow grease. In some parts of Ireland, but especially in Devonshire, England, and Ayrshire, Scotland, the butter made has had a world-wide fame. The plan pursued seems to be for the dairy-maids to wash their understandings, and perform the same operations as the French and Portuguese who dance among the grapes at the wine press. By having large tubs with false bottoms, covered with clean coarse cloth, into which the butter is placed and danced upon, with water to wash it as much as is required, all the cheesy matter is pressed through the coarse cloth, and runs off with the water of cleansing. This is a most efficient and effectual way of working butter for packing. As a general thing, the kind very common in our markets depends for its weight in having a good deal of the milk left in it, and none of the cheesy matter pressed out—it is a profitable way of producing it for sale. Butter for foreign countries should be well tramped or beat and washed some way, and it should be packed in a dish placed inside of a larger one, big enough to fill it around with salt.

Rancid butter can be completely cured of its bad taste and smell, by melting it in a clean tin dish, adding some saleratus, and straining it through a clean cloth. After this it appears of a different form; it crystalizes in soft round crystals, and has no taste like what it would have had, if made well at the first operation. All rancid butter for cooking should be treated in this way; it changes the butter, takes away the bad smell, prevents it from spoiling again, however long it may be kept, and it really has a very beautiful appearance. The butter should be kept stirred after it is all dissolved, about ten minutes. One ounce of saleratus will purify four pounds of butter. A thick sediment falls to the bottom, and a very thick scum gathers on the top. Butter is one of the finest articles of human food. The farmer with his snowy white bread and beautiful golden butter for breakfast, makes a richer feast than the monarch to which these things are denied. [Scientific Am.

Fascination.

Borrow, in his new work, "Lavengro," relates the following curious incident, connected with the power of fascination:—

"It happened that my brother and myself were playing one evening in a sandy lane; our mother was at a slight distance. All of a sudden, a bright yellow, and, to my infantine eye, beautiful and glorious object made its appearance at the top of the bank from between the thick quickset, and gliding down, began to move across the lane to the other side, like a line of golden light. Uttering a cry of pleasure, I sprang forward, and seized it nearly by the middle. A strange sensation of numbing coldness seemed to pervade my whole arm, which surprised me the more, as the object to the eye appeared so warm and sunlike. I did not drop it however, but, holding it up, looked at it intently, as its head dangled about a foot from my hand. It made no resistance; I felt not even the slightest struggle; but now my brother began to scream and shriek like one possessed. 'O mother, mother!' said he, 'the viper!—my brother has a viper in his hand!' He then, like one frantic, made an effort to snatch the creature away from me. The viper hissed amain, and raised its head, in which were eyes like hot coals, menacing, not myself, but my brother. I dropped my captive, for I saw my mother runing towards me; and the reptile after standing for a moment nearly erect, and still hissing furiously, made off, and disappeared. The whole scene is now before me, as vividly as if it occurred yesterday—the gorgeous viper, my poor dear frantic brother, my agitated parent, and a frightened hen clucking under the bushes—and yet I was not three years old.

"It is my firm belief that certain individuals possess an inherent power, or fascination, over certain creatures, otherwise I should be unable to account for many feats which I have witnessed, and, indeed, borne a share in, connected with the taming of brutes and reptiles. I have known a savage and vicious mare, whose stall it was dangerous to approach, even when bearing provender, welcome nevertheless, with every appearance of pleasure, an uncouth, wiry-headed man, with a frightfully seamed face, and an iron hook supplying the place of his right hand, one whom the animal had never seen before, playfully bite his hair, and cover his face with gentle and endearing kisses; and I have already stated how a viper would permit, without resentment one child to take it up in his hand, whilst it showed its dislike to the approach of another by the fiercest hissing. Philosophy can explain many strange things, but there are some which are a far pitch above her, and this is one."

A Strange Story.

A few days since a medical man named Phillippe died in a village near Paris, where he had resided many years, and had acquired a great reputation for skill and probity. He never demanded any remuneration, except from those who were in circumstances to be able to pay him; and during the last visit of the cholera he was indefatigable in his attention to the suffering poor. Last year an Englishman, traveling in that part of the country, was taken so suddenly ill that he was obliged to stop at an inn in the commune, and Dr. Phillippe was sent for. Scarcely, however, had he arrived at the bedside of the patient when the latter became violently agitated, and his countenance changed exceedingly. The doctor appeared also to be agitated, and at once ordered every one out of the room. When that was done the door was locked on the inside. The landlady being curious to know what was going on listened at the door, but the conversation was carried on in a language which she did not understand; she, however, heard the patient exclaim in French, "Assassin! assassin!" after which a violent altercation ensued. The Englishman appeared to threaten, and the doctor to supplicate him. The latter afterward left the room and went into the kitchen, where he prepared some medicine, which he ordered to be given to the patient several times during the night. On the following day the stranger was much worse, and feeling his end approaching, he made a sign for pen, ink and paper, and wrote a few words in English, which the landlady gave to the mayor of the commune, who, not understanding the language, threw it aside into a draw, where it was forgotten. The stranger died the same evening.

A few days since the mayor, when called on to register the death of the doctor, who in his turn had paid the debt of humanity, thought of this paper, and on his showing it to his nephew, who understood the language, it was found that Dr. Phillippe was no other than the famous Patieson, a noted robber of the United States, all trace of whom had been lost. The Englishman had recognized him as a man who had, twenty years before, attempted to murder him, while traveling in the State of Vermont, in America. The mayor immediately proceeded to the house of Dr. Phillippe to institute an inquiry. He found that he had, during his illness, refused to be undressed, and had made the persons who attended him promise that he should be buried in the clothes which he then wore. The mayor, however, ordered the body to be undressed, when it was found that the doctor was in reality a very spare man, although he always appeared stout, the bulk being caused by his wearing clothes wadded most thickly. His legs were also bandaged up, and one of his feet was found to be a very skillfully made artificial one. The body was covered with marks of wounds. In a dark closet there were found several chests fastened with triple locks; and on these being forced open, they were found to contain arms of various kinds, watches, gold coins of all nations, and diamonds and jewels to a considerable value. Particulars of this discovery have been transmitted to the Government, and a copy sent to the authorities of the State of Vermont. [Galignani.

Slavery at Mocha.

A correspondent of the Salem Register is describing the state of things around the Red Sea and in the kingdom of Muscat. The following is an extract:—

"Slavery is but nominal at Mocha, although many of the population are owned by the wealthy through purchase. Cargoes of slaves are often brought to this port from Abyssinia. The men and boys are well treated, often taught to read and write, and seldom worked severely, the drudgery of labor being performed by hired coolies. Without showing any sense of degradation at their condition, the slaves frequently dress as expensively as their masters, and good behavior often obtains for them offices of trust, while in willing bondage, or manumission. There are several instances at Mocha at the present time, of wealthy merchants and owners of many slaves, who formerly lived in servitude. An acquaintance of mine once expressed to an Arab merchant great surprise at seeing slaves so well treated. 'Suppose,' was the characteristic reply, 'a man has a son whom he cannot trust, and a faithful slave who will make for him a good business—why should he not make the slave the same as a son?' The offspring of male slaves are held in bondage, but if a master permits a slave to marry an Arab woman, he becomes free."

Contentment.—In Vienna a magnificent house was built by a nobleman, on the front of which is a stone with this inscription: "This house was erected by Count D——, to be given to the first man who can prove that he is really contented." One day a stranger knocked at the gate, and desired to speak with the master. "I am come," said he, "to take possession of this house, as I find you have built it in order to bestow it upon the man who is really contented. Now I am in that state, of which I am willing to make oath; you will therefore please, sir, to give me immediate possession." The count did not interrupt him till he had finished his speech, when he replied, "You are quite right, sir, with respect to my intentions; but as I do not discover the least pretension you have to the character of a contented man, I beg you will retire. If you were quite contented you would not want my house!"

A Relic of Witchcraft.

The Newburyport Herald of the 3d inst., gives an account of an old house, about to be demolished in that town, with which some interesting associations are connected. It is on High Street, at the head of Market street, and known as the Morse house, famous as the spot where first originated the witchcraft delusion in this country, that afterwards fled abroad, and from which flowed such terrible results. The house was built by William Morse, about the year 1645. Cotton Mather says that in the year 1679, this house was "so infested with demons," that whereas before, "the devil was chained up, the invisible hand did begin to put forth an astonishing visibility." The wife of William Morse narrowly escaped being hanged for a witch, as seventeen person gave their written testimony stating the reasons why they believed she was really a witch, and ought to be hung, according to the old Mosiac law, which says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." It is said to have been owing to the firmness of Gov. Bradstreet that the life of the woman was saved, and she was returned to her family. No explanation of the numerous exhibitions of ledgerdemain, which took place in this house to such an extent as to excite the wonder of the whole country, ever was given, and this is the more extraordinary, as they periled the life of the inmates and others, upon the scaffold. In Coffin's History of Newbury, evidence is adduced which leads to the suspicion that they were perpetrated by a roguish grandson of William Morse. It is strange, if he really was the author of the tricks, that he did not, at the time his grandmother was on trial for her life, acknowledge his agency in the matter.

Draining Land in England.

The Working Farmer says that the English Government are ever ready to lend judicious aid to their farming interest. As an example:—by long experience it has been ascertained that by thorough under-draining, an acre of land will produce one-third more nett results to the owner, and therefore the Government have enacted laws and appropriated funds to be used for this purpose. Several appropriations have been made during the last session of Parliament, one of which is £2,000,000 sterling, equal to $10,000,000. This sum is placed at the disposal of commissioners, who loan it to applicants on the following terms:—The farm of the applicant is first valued, and then a loan is made to him on mortgage, to be applied to under-draining his land under the inspection of the commissioners. This mortgage is only active on the increased value of the farm by under-drainage. The borrower is required to pay 5 per cent. interest, payable annually, and 5 per cent. of the principal, and thus in 20 years both principal and interest will be paid off; and the first instance has not yet occurred where the increased products of land have not been sufficiently great to enable the occupant to meet these payments. Should the borrower fail to meet the requirements of the mortgage, then the farm may be sold, but before the Government can appropriate any part of the amount toward the liquidation of their mortgage, they must first pay the borrower the amount at which the farm was valued before being under-drained; and long experience has established that under-drained farms will always sell for more than the cost of under-draining added to the commissioners valuations.

Who are your Aristocrats?

Twenty years ago, this one butchered, that one made candles; another sold cheese and butter, a fourth carried on a distillery, and another was a contractor on canals; others were merchants and mechanics. They are acquainted with both ends of society—as their children will be after them, though it will not do to say so out loud. For often you shall find that these toiling worms hatch butterflies, and they live about a year.

Death brings division of property, and it brings new financiers; the old agent is discharged, the young gentleman takes his revenues, and begins to travel—towards poverty, which he reaches before death—or his children do, if he does not. So, in fact, though there is a sort of monied rank, it is not hereditary; it is accessible to all; three good seasons of cotton will send a generation of men up—a score of years will bring them all down, and send their children again to labor. The father grubs and grows rich—his children strut and use the money; their children inherit the pride, and go to shiftless poverty; but the next generation below, reinvigorated by fresh plebeian blood, and by the smell of the clod, come up again. Thus society, like a tree, draws its sap from the earth, changes it into leaves and blossoms, spreads them abroad in great glory, sheds them off to fall back to the earth, again to mingle with the soil, and at length to reäppear in new trees freshly garnitured.

Natural Clairvoyance.—We witnessed, on Monday, some most remarkable experiments in Natural Clairvoyance, as we must call it for want of a better name. We had a visit from M. Gaudon, of Paris, and his nephew, M. Gouhenant, between whom there apparently exists a magnetic sympathy of an intimate character. The nephew, a youth of 16, was stationed in one room and M. Gaudon in another. Neither could see the other, and there was no word spoken; but any words, sentences, figures or object whatever, seen by the uncle, were at once and unhesitatingly read or described by the other. The impression on the mind of the former was instantly communicated to the latter and promptly spoken—not in the slow and confused manner common to clairvoyants in the mesmeric sleep. Expressions in several different languages were tried with the same satisfactory result. There was no possibility of collusion under the circumstances, since the experiments were conducted by ourselves, the words selected at random, and the answers too ready to be got at by any system of signs or hidden meanings. Indeed, taking into consideration the fact that neither party saw or spoke to the other, we can only account for the exhibition on the ground that M. Gouhenant is a natural clairvoyant. These experiments, which attracted much curiosity in Paris, are to be produced in New York. [Tribune.

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

Reply to "Exodus"—Part 2.

"Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." Matt 5: 20.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—I hope no one may be dismayed by the length to which this discussion has been carried, or discouraged from reading it for fear of its resulting in the establishment of error, or the perplexity of merely "doubtful disputations." It is a Christian law, (doubted by no Protestant, and disputed only by the Romanist,) "prove all things; hold fast that which is good; abstain from all appearance of evil" Truth loves examination. Rooted in its Eternal Author, God, it rears its majestic form to the light of evidence, and safe in His protection defies alike the tempestuous sway of opinion, the lightning shaft of wit, and the untempered edge of sophistry. The clouds of the tempest may indeed envelope and obscure it for a moment; yet it soon reappears, stripped haply of its decayed branches and redundant foliage, but intact in every vital part, more perfect in beauty, corroborated in strength, and rejoicing in the radiant light of day. Such, I cannot but believe, will, through God's grace, be the result of the present discussion. If the Sabbath be no part of the Law of God, let it perish. If it be, one must indeed be "weak in faith" to fear its overthrow by any fair discussion, when he hears Him who is Truth itself declaring, "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than for one tittle of the Law to fail." (Luke xvi. 17.)

2. The main strength and sole hope of my friend "Exodus" lies in the second of the six propositions he defends, viz., that "the Sabbath was strictly a ceremonial and Jewish institution." All his other propositions in reality rest upon this, and stand or fall with it. I wish this point to be distinctly understood, marked, remembered, and inwardly digested. It was in fact involved in the preceding proposition, according to its real import, as I have shown. If, then, I have succeeded in my argument there, and have proved that the Law of the Sabbath, like that of Marriage, dates "from the beginning" of the world, and belongs to the whole race, then I have in fact already demolished this second proposition, and with it all the rest. My friend "Exodus" may exclaim against this summary conclusion, in reply to his lengthened argument; but I submit it even to him, as a "good logician," if the entire consequence does not legitimately follow. I know he may attempt to escape the consequence; but it will be solely by challenging the proof I have presented of the premises. Of such challenge, however, I feel no fear. Why should I? I live for Truth. It may, however, be satisfactory to him, as a lover of truth and consistency, if I examine all his remaining propositions and reasonings in detail, and show that the principles I have established already under the first proposition pervade the entire New Testament, and give a vital unity and glorious harmony to all the various facts and representations of the Bible. If the patience of my readers will hold out, I will, as far as time and space permit, undertake this, using all the brevity consistent with justice to the argument.

Let us, then, scrutinize more closely this second proposition, with the reasonings of "Exodus" upon it. The question between us here is precisely this: He affirms the strictly ceremonial and national character of the Sabbath, and I its moral and universal authority.

Now, I take it for granted, that two men of average intelligence and candor, with the same sources of evidence open before them, could not come to such opposite conclusions on a question like this, unless the question were complicated with circumstances that tend to confound moral and ceremonial distinctions, and thus to lead one of them unwittingly to a false issue. Here, in all candor, I think, lies the root of my friend's difficulties; and not of his alone, but of many others whose opinions he has subsequently quoted, though not always to the point. And here I may as well say, once for all, that of the writers he has cited, I think only Warburton and Paley, perhaps Dr. Whateley also, (eminent, but often mistaken men,) fully agree with him in his Anti-Sabbatarian views. Of the unguarded language of others, he has made a use, I think, they never designed; but "what is written is written," and published too; and being fairly quoted by my friend, must go for what it is worth.

His first argument for the ceremonial nature of the Sabbath is drawn from the fact of its incorporation with the ceremonial law of the Jews. (Lev. xxiii.) The fact is clear. I admit it. His inference is: Therefore the Sabbath was "strictly ceremonial and Jewish." This conclusion, I submit, is in logic a non sequitur. The inference does not by any necessity follow from the fact. Let us try it in another strictly parallel case. The Law of Marriage was incorporated with the ceremonial law of the Jews. The fact is clear. Therefore Marriage is a "strictly ceremonial and Jewish institution!" Will my friend "Exodus" accept this inference? It is just as sound as his own; and he is bound either to accept it in both cases, or to reject it in both.

His next argument is drawn from the incorporation of a motive from Jewish history into the reasons for its observance. (Deut. v. 15.) But this is explained by the fact that Moses is here rehearsing the Decalogue in a way peculiarly applicable to the Jewish people. No such motive is found in the Decalogue itself, as originally delivered by God; although very proper to be added afterwards to enforce its observance upon them.

But suppose it were found appended to the original reason given in Ex. xx. 11; how does this prove the second proposition? That grand "re-publication of the law of nature," the Decalogue, was given to mankind through that nation, till the Messiah should come. Deut. xviii. 20. Rom. v. 20. Gal. iii. 19. Though universal in its nature, it was of course particular in its application. It was all for the time incorporated both with their ceremonial and civil code. Was it all, therefore, "strictly ceremonial and Jewish?" Will "Exodus" really affirm this? Much of his reasoning implies it, yet I am unwilling to impute to him a conclusion so immoral, as well as illogical.

Very different, it seems to me, is the language of our Lord in the opening of his Sermon on the Mount. "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am come, not to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." Matt. v. 17, 18. And lest any of his own disciples, in consequence of the abrogation of the strictly Jewish code, should suppose and teach any relaxation of the moral code, he adds the solemn warning which I have prefixed as a motto to these articles: "Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." That by "these commandments," our Lord meant the commandments of the Decalogue, seems to me so perfectly plain from the specifications which follow, that I consider it beyond all dispute. When it is formally denied, it will be time enough formally to prove it. Let it suffice now to say, that his first examples are taken from the sixth and seventh (perhaps also from the third and ninth) commandments of the Decalogue; and that every other is of a moral, not one of a ceremonial nature, throughout this whole discourse. Could any thing add to the evidence thus given, that as Lord and Judge of the world, Christ recognizes the Decalogue as the immutable Law of God, and ratifies all its commandments in their genuine import, and stripped of every Pharisaic construction, as fundamental laws of his own kingdom?

I can think of but one objection to this, so far as the Sabbath is concerned. It may be said, "Christ does not specify the fourth commandment as a part of this immutable law; therefore it may be an exception." Is it then necessary, after so decisive and comprehensive a statement as to every "jot or tittle of the Law," that he descend to a specification of every commandment? As well might you raise the same objection against the first commandment, or the second, or the fifth, or the eighth, as against the fourth. "But He does specify them elsewhere," it may be said. I answer, Yes, the fifth and eighth—(perhaps the first and tenth also)—but no where the second. Is the second, then, abolished by Christ? What! when the world was full of idolatry and image worship, to be conquered by His word! Absurd and monstrous supposition! I do not impute to "Exodus" such quibbles and evasions as these. But then I say, equally absurd is the attempt to detach the fourth commandment from the Decalogue; of which it ever formed an integral part, from the day that it was uttered by the voice of God from the blazing summit of Sinai, and was engraven by his finger in the two tables of stone; distinctions equally sublime and significant, which were never accorded to any of the merely local and temporary laws of Judaism, either civil or ceremonial.

The Law of the Sabbath, then, beyond all controversy, is one of "these commandments." And even if "one of the least of them," it is expressly comprehended in the warning of our Lord. And if a thousand Christian divines, of the highest distinction, with Luther and Calvin at their head, were to "break it and to teach men so," from some mistaken view of Christian liberty under the gospel, how would that alter the case? Will they sit on the throne of final judgment, and pronounce our sentence? They are but men; great men, indeed, but fallible; and to their own Master, in this matter, they stand or fall. I, too, could quote great divines on my side. But I will not. Let Christ speak for himself.

But "the particular day, 'the seventh day,' is also," says my friend, "an integral portion of the Decalogue. Is that also to be acknowledged to be of a moral nature?" This I have so fully answered already, under the preceding proposition, that I should not advert to it again, except to correct my friend, who quotes me as allowing "that a part of the Decalogue is not of a moral nature." I have made no such exception. The seventh day of the Decalogue, I hold to be a part of the moral law of the Sabbath, but not the mere circumstance of its order, or mode of designation. Half the dispute, at least, on this subject, springs from confounding two things perfectly distinct in their nature, viz: the seventh day of the Decalogue, and the seventh day of the Jewish week. The connection was fixed by statute only for that people. This, therefore, may be changed by competent authority, I mean by the authority of "the Lord of the Sabbath day," without touching "one jot or tittle" of the Decalogue. And it was changed, as we have seen. The connection was dissolved at once, by the abrogation of the Jewish code. The Decalogue remained immutable, but all else that was peculiar to Judaism was abolished.

But the Sabbath "was actually peculiar to the Jews," says my friend. "Throughout all history we discover no trace of a Sabbath among the nations of antiquity." My friend here speaks as if all history were under his eye. But he has fallen into a mistake here, which proves that he has not read all history. I have corrected his mistake by the united testimony of seven competent witnesses—Homer, Hesiod, Callimachus, Philo, Josephus, Clement, and Eusebius.

But "moral law," says my friend, "being founded on natural and universal relations, must be as immutable as those relations." Granted. And therefore the Decalogue, which is founded on such relations, remained intact, when every thing "strictly ceremonial and Jewish" was swept away like shadows before the sun!

But, says Exodus, "the Sabbath has been changed in its period, changed in the reasons for its observance, changed in the character of its requirements, and changed in its sanction." Wherein? It is still the same weekly "period" required in the Decalogue. The original "reasons" for its observance remain, only new and more affecting motives have been supplied, by the death and resurrection of our Redeemer! No change has been made in the "nature of its observance," except the abolition of the "strictly ceremonial and Jewish" code, with which it once was incorporated, together with all the peculiar constructions, penalties, and sanctions of that code." Like Marriage, it now stands as "in the beginning;" pure from every tincture of Judaism; hallowed and beautified with new and loftier associations. Preëminently now a part of "the perfect and royal law of liberty" from the slavery of the world, the bright link of man with man, and earth with heaven, the safeguard of virtue, the glory of religion, the pillar and prop of society, the palladium of nations, "the pearl of days," the blessing of this world, and the beacon light of that which is to come; who that rightly understands its worth can fail to "call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable!"

But my friend now calls in to his aid the authority of the Apostle to the Gentiles. "'Sabbath days,' (says Paul, in Coll. ii. 16,) 'are a shadow of good things to come.' This, apart from all the previous considerations, would itself be conclusive. No one will pretend that a shadow or type can be other than ritual." My friend has inserted the world "good" into the text; probably from inadvertence. I hope its discovery may be a lesson of caution and charity to him in future. But now for the Apostle's meaning. "The language of the text," says my friend, "is comprehensive and unqualified, All sabbath days are equally included. This is clear from the context, &c. He who asserts a limitation of its application must clearly prove it." And I hope clearly to prove it thus. Paul is the servant of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ taught the perpetuity of the Decalogue, in even the least of its commandments, of which the Sabbath is one. This therefore was the doctrine of Paul. "The disciple is not above his Master," says Christ, "but every one that is perfect shall be as his Master." Luke vi. 40. With what astonishment would Paul, if he were now among us bodily, behold an attempt to torture his language into a direct opposition to a fundamental doctrine of his Master! What conceivable form of "wresting the Scriptures" could be more painful to his generous spirit? It may not be! Having received the gospel by the direct "revelation of Jesus Christ," (Gal. i. 11, 12,) it is impossible that he could mean to teach the abrogation of the Decalogue, in direct contradiction to his Lord. Any interpretation that leads to such an issue, violates an axiom, and overturns the first principles of all sound interpretation. It is nothing less, in effect, than attempting to make the Savior contradict himself! It follows, that "all sabbath days are" not "equally included," but only those peculiar to Judiasm, and which the false teachers upheld in opposition to Christ as "the head of all principality and power." (Verse 10th.) The whole of the context, from verse 6th to verse 10th of this chapter, is the Apostle's protest against these Judaizing teachers. They would have placed the yoke of circumcision and of the whole Jewish law upon the Gentile believers. Paul resists this unwarrantable imposition, by showing—1st, that Christ, as "Head over all things," had a right to set it aside; 2d, that he had really conferred on believers all the blessings it vainly promised; 3d, that therefore Christ was the substance, and that ceremonial system but the "shadow;" from all which it follows, that no man could lawfully condemn them for not observing it, in any part of its burdensome ritual. Even to observe the Sabbath, in a Jewish way, (i. e. on the seventh day of the week, and in combination with other Jewish "holy days,") would in a Gentile Christian be wrong; in a Jewish Christian it would be a matter of indifference, expediency, and condescension only; but for either to observe it as a part of an obligatory ritual, would be a renunciation of the authority of Christ, and therefore of the Gospel itself. It is in this connection that Paul uses this lauguage, here and elsewhere, which some have mistaken for a repudiation of the Decalogue, and among them my friend "Exodus."

The truth is, such a mistake, in him, is a logical result of his principles. He starts wrong at the beginning. He does not recognize the moral law in the Decalogue. His standpoint is not that of Christ, and therefore not that of Paul. Hence he allows not to the ardent language of the Apostle, in a contest against Judaizing teachers, the necessary limitations that keep it in holy harmony with the doctrine of his Lord. This is the source of that fatal confusion in an intellect naturally bright and clear, and therefore the more likely, when itself misled, to "make the worse appear the better reason."

Let me make Paul's meaning plain by an illustration. Suppose, with my views of the Decalogue and of the Sabbath, I were arguing with a modern Jew, or, if you please, with a Seventh-Day Baptist, (many of whom are excellent men,) and they both should insist upon the obligation of the seventh day of the week in opposition to the first. I should resist them both as Paul does, on the very ground that they, wittingly or unwittingly, upheld the authority of the whole abrogated Jewish ritual, and denied the authority of Christ as Head over all. And if I saw any of my fellow Christians, from weakness of faith and tenderness of conscience, yielding to the plausible reasonings which would confound in a single point the Jewish ritual with the Decalogue, I would invoke them, by all their obligations of adoring gratitude to a crucified Redeemer, "stand fast in the liberty with which Christ had made them free." Does "Exodus" now understand me? Does he not now understand Paul?

The conclusion of the whole argument is, that "Exodus" is not justified in the confident announcement that the Sabbath was a "strictly Jewish and ceremonial institution." On the contrary, it is demonstrated by the highest of all evidence, the testimony of Christ himself, that it is an integral and inseparable part of the Moral Law, and therefore of universal and perpetual obligation.

3. The third proposition, that "Jesus studiously and repeatedly violated the Sabbath," "Exodus" has attempted to defend at length; but so weakly that it will require but few remarks in reply, and those chiefly by way of explanation.

His defense is built upon the construction of the word "work," in the fourth commandment. "The lighting of a fire, the gathering of grain or food, the picking up of sticks, unnecessary walking, even the carrying of the slightest burden," he says, "all fall within the legal construction of the prohibition."

Had he put the word "unnecessary," which he prefixes alone to "walking," before the entire enumeration, he would have stated the exact truth. But now it conveys a wrong and injurious impression, injurious to the Jewish code, and injurious to our Saviour. By a miracle, every week repeated in the wilderness, God had made the gathering of food, the lighting of a fire, &c., on the Sabbath, unnecessary. To do any of these things in such circumstances was therefore justly construed as a violation of the law. But when the Pharisees applied this construction to the act of the disciples, who plucked the grain merely to satisfy the cravings of hunger, our Saviour says justly, that they "condemned the guiltless." My friend must be hard driven for evidence, when he infers, from the case of David eating the shewbread, a perfect parallel between the two laws. David did do in his necessity what was unlawful by the express terms of the ceremonial statute; and necessity alone excused him. But the disciples did not violate the Sabbath at all, for no "necessary" work was forbidden, as is clear from the case of the priests in the temple. When our Saviour says, "they profane the Sabbath, and are blameless," he evidently means to confound the Pharisees on their own principles of construction. On any other view, the language would be self-contradictory. On this view it is perfectly in point. And when he adds that "there is one present greater than the temple," meaning himself, he evidently claims that his authority is paramount in settling the construction, and his decision final in pronouncing his disciples "guiltless."

To charge our Lord with a "studied violation of the Sabbath," because he commanded the impotent man whom he had healed on the Sabbath day to "take up his bed and walk," is again to adopt the Pharisaic construction. For the poor man's bed was evidently nothing but (krabbaton) a small portable couch or mattress, such as travelers carried about with them; and yet, to carry it home with him is construed by my friend "Exodus" as "in the very face of the express interdict," in Jer. xvii. 21, against bearing burdens on the Sabbath day! I suppose, on the same principle, he must consider our Lord's healing on that day a "studied violation of the Sabbath." Happily we have a better authority to assure us, every where and always, that "it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day."

In truth, the only argument of any weight under this proposition, (and that belongs under the preceding, and does not sustain this,) is drawn from the words of our Lord, which I had quoted in proof that the Sabbath is of a moral nature, and of universal force, viz., "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." My friend asks, "Could he have said this of any law but a positive and ceremonial one? Assuredly NOT!" I answer, WHY not? The argument which he quotes from Bishop Warburton, and adopts as decisive of the question, I think is only one of the Bishop's specious fallacies. Try it on a kindred case—just substituting the Law of Marriage for the Law of the Sabbath. Axiom—"Man was not made for Marriage, but Marriage was made for man." Now look at the argument of the Bishop. "Were the observance of the Law of Marriage (in the seventh commandment) a natural duty, it is certain man was made for that law; the end of his creation being for the observance of the moral law. On the contrary, all positive institutions were made for man." And now for my friend's inference. "This furnishes a proof that the (seventh) commandment is positive, ceremonial, and Jewish!" Who does not perceive the fallacy of this?

The truth is, there is a distinction in moral laws, which this argument overlooks altogether. Our Saviour teaches, (Matt. v. 19,) that some of the precepts of the Law of God, though of binding force to the end of time, are yet of less importance than others. Some moral laws are founded in moral relations, which exist in the present world, but not in the next. Thus it is with the moral laws of conjugal and filial affection. Yet how truly moral, universal, and sacred here! And thus it is with the law of the Sabbath. It is founded upon our moral relations to God and man in the present life, whether necessary or not in the future, as I showed in my very first communication. Of that argument for the moral nature of the Sabbath, "Exodus," in his defense, has taken no notice whatever. But I cannot help saying here, that if he can set aside the moral nature of the fourth commandment, it will be an easy thing, by the same process, to set aside the fifth and seventh; not to say the sixth, eighth, ninth, and tenth. "Facilis descensus Averni; sed revocare—." He will understand and appreciate this school-boy quotation.

I know he accuses me of making "sad nonsense" of our Lord's words in the passage under consideration. And the argument, as he ingeniously puts it, is, as he says, "logic with a vengeance." But let me try to put it in its proper shape. "You accuse my disciples," says Christ, "of breaking the Sabbath. I have proved that you are both unjust, and inconsistent with yourselves, in this accusation." (See his whole argument on this point above.) "But now, to cover the whole ground of right construction in future, I lay down this broad axiom, 'The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. And because designed like all other moral laws for the benefit of the whole race, therefore the Son of Man, (to whom it is given to judge the whole race,) is Lord also of the Sabbath day; i. e., the proper judge of the manner of its observance or desecration.' In the exercise of this rightful authority, I must rescue it from your technical and bigoted construction, and restore it to its original use and end."

I submit to every unprejudiced mind, nay, I submit to "Exodus" himself, whether there is any want of logical connection, or sound sense, or self consistency, in our Lord's words, according to this construction. On the contrary, do they not, when thus understood, perfectly agree with his character, his office, his uniform doctrine, and all the exigencies of the case? Thus understood, what a sublime dignity do they give to the Sabbath, and to him as "the Lord of the Sabbath." But understand them as "Exodus" would have us, and every trace of their glory vanishes. "The Son of Man is Lord"—of what? Of a "strictly ceremonial and Jewish institute!" "entirely subservient to men!" and vanishing away with other "shadows!" "No great harm in breaking 'shadows,' you know," says my friend, gayly. Most true; but take care that you do not impinge upon something more substantial! Take care that you do not strike at foundation stones in the great edifice of religion and morals. "The truth is, (to use his own language in part,) this much perverted quotation (Mark ii. 28) was pronounced, not as a check upon (Sabbatarians,) but to counteract (bigoted Pharisees,) and honesty requires that it should not be employed for an opposite purpose."

To conclude this part of the subject: My friend thinks the passages in Matt. xii. 2, Mark. ii. 25, John v. 10, and ix. 16, must have escaped my memory, when I observed on this third proposition, "This is the first time I remember to have seen 'Him who knew no sin,' charged with a 'studied and repeated violation of the law of God.'" By no means. I knew that Pharisaic Jews had brought the charge before; but I meant (as my context shows) that it was the first time I had found that charge endorsed by a Christian writer. I had indeed read Paley; but I thought his language was more guarded; and on recurring to Paley's argument, I am happy to acquit him of the charge in question; nor do I now remember any professedly Christian writer, except the author of these propositions, who has endorsed it. That the Jews did make the charge "with malice prepense," is manifest; but I think too well of my friend "Exodus," in spite of all his mistakes, to class him with men who had murder in their hearts against the "Lord of the Sabbath."

Nevertheless, I am bound to remind him that this charge against our Lord is a grave one, and, if not sustained, (as I think on reflection he must feel that it is not,) demands on his part profound regret and public retraction. It is "a word against the Son of Man," which, though not unpardonable, (as He in his mercy assures us,) is yet really "false and calumnious," injurious to his honor, to his purity, to his piety, to his self-consistency, to his uniform regard for the Sabbath, and for the virtue and happiness of mankind, to say nothing of his self consuming zeal for their salvation. May the mild, majestic eye, that once looked on Peter, look on my friend!

4. His fourth proposition, that "the New Testament never encourages Sabbath observance nor condemns Sabbath breaking," will detain me but for a moment. It is so vitally involved in what has been discussed, that every one will see that the proper observance of the Sabbath, before Christ's resurrection, on the seventh day of the Jewish week, and after that memorable event upon the first, is always implied, as well as often expressed. Indeed, it is evident that for many years the Apostles observed both, though for different reasons, and only among the Jews.

My friend treats with lightness the evidence I adduced from 1 Tim. i. 9—11, of the condemnation of Sabbath breaking, as one species of profaneness. I do not wonder; since it is quite evident, from the manner in which he quotes it and comments on it, that he looked only at the 9th verse. But I beg him to examine this passage again. The force of the argument it yields lies open before every plain English reader, in the order observed by the Apostle in his specification of sins and sinners. So exact a correspondence with the order of the ten commandments of the Decalogue, cannot be the work of chance. It follows—1st. That the Decalogue is recognized as the moral standard "according to the glorious Gospel of the blessed God." 2d. That Sabbath breakers are certainly included among "the ungodly and profane," and as such condemned. The force of this conclusion is hightened by a more exact translation of the first words, thus, "The law does not lie against a righteeous man, but against the lawless and disobedient, the ungodly and profane," &c. Against all such (including Sabbath breakers) the law of God is leveled. A thought more pregnant with grave and solemn meaning can hardly be conceived. My friend in his haste overlooked the real force and bearing of this passage on the argument, or he could not have treated it lightly. This is my excuse for him, for only "fools make a mock at sin." Prov. xiv. 9.

I regret that I cannot take up the two remaining propositions this week. They are defended by "Exodus" with an ability, an earnestness, an extent of reading and research, a force of personal conviction, and mingled feelings of triumph and tenderness towards me, beyond anything he has before displayed, and really worthy of a better cause. Though still compelled to differ from him in his main conclusion, I am happy to see some common ground where I can embrace him with sentiments of esteem as well as of admiration and affection. I look forward to the encounter with him where we disagree, with something (though not unkindly) of > "That stern joy which warriors feel

> In foemen worthy of their steel."

I shall aim to do full justice to his arguments, but I promise in my reply not to exceed the length of his own defense. In the mean time may the "Lord of the Sabbath" throw around my friend the pure radiance of "the perfect law of liberty," that he may "see things as they are." J. N. B.

DEMAND OF THE AGE.

That great pioneer missionary, the late Rev. Dr. Judson, while in this country a few years ago, wrote a letter, March 5, 1846, to the New York Baptist Register, in which he expressed his astonishment that so little effort is made by religious people to disseminate religious newspapers. In the following extract he proceeds to state two great demands of the age. Read and ponder:—

"There are two things especially requisite to carry forward the grand enterprises of the present age, which have for their object the removal of internal evils, the advance of true religion, and the establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom in foreign lands. The first requisite is Education Societies, and Collegiate and Theological Institutions for training the agents to be employed in these enterprises. Such societies and institutions have received considerable, though not sufficient attention. The second requisite is the active cöoperation of the religious periodicals throughout the land. This object has been too much neglected and forgotten. Neither the cause of education, nor Bible and Tract Societies, nor missionary efforts can be long and worthily sustained, unless these objects are presented to the public mind, so as to enlighten, and interest, and stimulate to action. An agent goes through the country; he tells some pathetic story; a tear starts from the eye, and a fippenny from the pocket; and as he passes on with the speed of the black horse, his voice dies away on the ear like the faint echo of sounding brass, or tinkling cymbal; the half-formed tear is suppressed, the purse-string closes over the remaining fippennies, and things remain in statu quo, until the next annual spasm. Effective effort must be based on intelligent principle. Knowledge must be extensively communicated. The field of labor must be spread before the public, and they made well acquainted with the necessities and practicabilities of the case, the efforts that are making, and the successes, though small, that have attended those efforts; and this must be done mainly through religious periodicals. The great societies of the day could do no better thing than to send forth their agents, not merely to go proclaiming about the country, but to penetrate into every village and hamlet, and solicit subscriptions to their various organs of communication with the public. This would increase their contributions, and enlarge their funds beyond all past precedent."

MEDICAL AID AUXILIARY TO PREACHING.

Almost all missionaries in India find attentions to the body in illness, sometimes lead to the spiritual and eternal benefit of the soul. The Rev. Mr. Smith, of the (Eng.) Baptist Mission at Chitaura, writes recently:

"I vaccinated thirty-two children about a fortnight since, and all have taken. I am very badly off for want of medicines, and they are so expensive that I cannot afford to purchase all I want. I am anxious, however, to maintain my ground in this department of labor, as it is an auxiliary of no little value to my preaching duties. We have people now living in our village, who have been brought over by the kindness and benefits they have received from me in sickness. A short time since, a man was brought to me on a charpai very ill. I attended him with medicine and food, and through the blessing of God he recovered. He returned home to his village about three miles distant, but could not forget that his life had been saved by a stranger, who asked nothing in return except that he should bless God and honor Jesus Christ whom he had sent to save sinners. He now attends the house of God, bringing with him all he can persuade to come; himself and his aged parents all profess faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and I hope ere long to have the pleasure of seeing them buried with him by baptism. Our brother Thakur Das went to visit them last week, and after speaking to them engaged in prayer; at the conclusion he was surprised by the old woman also commencing and offering up a short prayer. During her son's illness she remained with him, and used to attend Mrs. Smith's prayer-meeting and all the other services; and it appears on going home she commenced to offer up daily prayer and thanksgiving in her family. There are many instances of good from medical aid which I could mention."

To tell a man to his face, to mind his own business, would be considered about equal to knocking him down, or, as the Frenchman said, "horizontalizing his perpendicular." And yet it is one of the simplest rules of right conduct, and one of the most useful that mankind can adopt in their intercourse with each other.

The record of life runs thus:—Man creeps into childhood—bounds into youth—sobers into manhood—softens into age—totters into second childhood, and slumbers into the cradle prepared for him.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

Having pledged ourselves to lay before our readers the discussion which has been carried on in the columns of the Christian Chronicle under the above title, we shall endeavor to redeem our pledge, though we had no idea, when we undertook it, that it would be drawn out to such a length. We did not expect, either, that such unequal advantage would be granted to the two disputants by the Chronicle. If the conductors of that print are bona fide friends of free discussion, why not allow "Exodus" as much space as his opponent? Why choke him off with the pretense that they cannot spare the room, and yet allow "J. N. B." to continue week after week? It strikes us that this is not the fair thing.

In the article of "J. N. B." which we publish this week, we find but little to object to. It is, on the whole, a very good refutation of the second of the six propositions of his antagonist, that "the Sabbath was strictly a ceremonial and Jewish institution." It was always a matter of surprise to us, that the incorporation of a motive from Jewish history into the reasons for its observance, (Deut. 5: 15,) should be adduced as proof of its strictly ceremonial character. As if there could not be two reasons for doing the same thing; or as if, when one general and universal reason had been assigned, another one of a particular application could not be added, without destroying the force of the first! When we hear the duty of children to honor their parents urged, we have no difficulty in seeing that the duty is of a moral and universal nature. But suppose, for example, that a father has, by great exertions, and at a large outlay of money, ransomed his dozen sons from captivity in a foreign land. When afterwards he enforces filial duty upon them, and draws his motive from the ransom he has paid for them, we do not suppose that that constitutes the only reason why they should love and obey him. We consider it simply as a special reason, growing out of the peculiar favor which has been conferred upon them, but by no means invalidating that one which is of general application. His children are bound to love him independent of the special favor he has done them. So the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage was a special reason for their keeping holy the Sabbath day, and particularly for carrying out that part of the commandment which required its rest to be allowed to the "man-servant and the maid-servant." But it had before been said, 'Keep holy the Sabbath-day, because God on that day rested from all his works which he had created and made;' and the force of that reason was not destroyed by the one which was now super-added. As long as the original reason for sabbatizing remains unrepealed, and manifestly concerns the whole human race as well as the Jewish people, it is "logic with a vengeance" to infer, as Exodus does, from the super-added reason, the strictly ceremonial character of the institution. We wish, too, that "J. N. B." could see, that the original reason applies with peculiar force to the seventh day of the week, and that it is wholly inapplicable to any other.

Our readers will discover, that "J. N. B." holds "the seventh day of the Decalogue to be a part of the moral law of the Sabbath, but not the mere circumstance of its order or mode of designation." And what does he mean by this? Why, that "the seventh day of the Decalogue, and the seventh day of the Jewish week," are "two things perfectly distinct in their nature." Most sagacious critic! In what part of the Bible does he find authority for a Jewish week? The only week which the Bible knows any thing about is that which was fixed at creation. Throughout its pages there is not one iota of reference to any other. There is not the smallest hint given, that its beginning was ever changed. The beginning of the year was changed, when the Passover was first instituted, but the beginning of the week never. The distinction which "J. N. B." makes is, therefore, founded in sheer assumption. It is not true, that "the connection was fixed by statute only for that people." The fourth commandment itself designates the day, not as the seventh after any six of labor, but as that particular seventh day upon which God, at the close of creation, rested. Of no other day does the commandment speak, and of that it does speak in language too plain to be misunderstood.

The disposition, formerly so common, to class Seventh-day Baptists with Jews, as "upholding the authority of the whole abrogated Jewish ritual, and denying the authority of Christ as Head over all," we are sorry to see manifested in "J. N. B." We had hoped that such bigoted illiberality was passing away. But we are, as yet, a very small sect, and the dominant parties in Christendom think that they can afford to dispense with our influence. We know of some few places, however, where Seventh-day Baptist influence is so strong, that all other denominations combined can accomplish nothing of general interest without their coöperation. Nobody there thinks of denouncing them as Judaizers. The minister of the Gospel who should do so, would be advised to make himself better acquainted with their principles. But "J. N. B." is in a position where he can do so with impunity. There are but few Seventh-day Baptists in Philadelphia.

We have but a word to add, and we shall then leave the subject to make its own impression. As "Sabbath-breakers are certainly included among 'the ungodly and profane,' and as such condemned," we would just remind "J. N. B." that in the Acts of the Apostles, written after the resurrection of our Lord, and quite as late as Paul's epistle to Timothy, the Sabbath is spoken of a number of times, and the reference is in every instance to the seventh day of the week. Therefore those who secularize the seventh day of the week are those Sabbath-breakers who are "certainly included among 'the ungodly and profane,' and as such condemned." Q. E. D.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 35.

GLASGOW, April 4th, 1851.

At several of the Half-Yearly Scottish Railway Meetings, the question of Sunday traveling has been again discussed. Yesterday the Scottish Central agreed to a modification of theirs—a motion having been carried, that local Sunday traffic be discontinued, without interfering with the through traffic on the line arising from connection with other lines The Sunday trains will therefore run, carrying passengers from districts beyond, but at the stations upon the Scottish Central itself, tickets will not be sold. It is, however, left to the Directors to carry out the alteration when they see best, and it is perhaps not unlikely that they may allow the bustle of the London Exhibition to pass, receiving the profits, before enforcing the decision. But at the meeting of the Edinburgh, Perth and Dundee Railway, along which there is an early morning goods train, as well as the passenger trains, a corresponding motion for their discontinuance was negatived by a majority of 280 against 71; and at the Caledonian meeting, when a similar motion was voted upon, only the mover and seconder held up their hands in its favor.

The Papal Aggression Bill is to go into Committee on the 2d of next month. The discussion in the House of Commons has greatly enraged the Popish party. They seem to have calculated on the crime of the Pope being overlooked, and their mistake seems to have astonished them. The organs of the party are urging the desperate course upon the Romish M. P.s of permitting no business to be transacted; although it can hardly be expected that a small minority would long be permitted to continue such obstruction, if acted upon, when confessedly adopted for factious purposes. The priests have made Ireland a most miserable country; and they still labor hard to prevent others from doing any thing to mend matters amongst them. A Sheriff was shot at, the other day, when going to serve a writ upon a tenant who had paid no rent for four years; and every danger besets the manufacturer who transfers his capital thither, to employ the indolent and impoverished population. Meanwhile, the sales of Encumbered Estates go on, and much property has changed hands.

On Monday last, a census of our entire population was taken by order of Government. Returns were at the same time requested (not demanded) of the attendance, &c., at churches, chapels, and schools. Some of the clergymen of the Established Churches have strongly objected to the investigation which is thus quietly being made into matters which they do not wish to reveal. It is, I think, just ten years since last census, but it is expected that there will be evidence both of increased indifference and increased dissent. One of those who refused to pay the Church's annuity money in Edinburgh, last year, is now a member of the Town Council there, having been elected to office while he was a prisoner, at the instance of the clergy, and walked from the jail to the Council Chambers.

The Canadian House of Assembly having last year resolved that it would be expedient to sell their Clergy Reserves, which have been a fruitful cause of strife, our Government have expressed their reluctant assent, on the ground of an unwillingness to oppose the general desire of the local Government, especially as provision has been made for maintaining the interests of parties presently interested in the matter.

I am glad to observe, that a warning voice has been lifted up in the Sabbath Recorder against having recourse to those who profess to reveal, by mysterious rappings, the state and affairs of the dead. As religion declines, and iniquity prevails, in the last times, Scripture leads us to expect evil agencies of a spiritual character to prevail. As when God refused to answer Saul, either by prophets or by dreams, he consulted one that was a witch, so may we expect that when God's prophetic announcements of coming events are disregarded, and His revelations of spiritual things are disbelieved, men will have recourse to enchantments. The existence and agency of the Evil One have little place in the creed of many in the present day; and from this scepticism he obtains the greater power for their delusion. Philosophy, falsely so called, has charms for many; and in such forms is, therefore, instilled, which leads to destruction. Even rappings are not peculiar to America, or the present day. In this country they had a place, in former ages, as well as in modern times—although to the United States belongs the peculiarity, so far as I am aware, of having spelled out the communications of the Deceiver, so conveyed. Such things are not at present spoken of here; but we have what appears to me the same unlawful agency largely employed under the names of Mesmerism, and Electro-Biology. Under this latter denomination, a Mr. Darling, from the United States, is giving exhibitions which are much patronized—which, Dr. S. R. Maitland leads me to believe, is one of the sins for which the Canaanites were divinely ordered to be destroyed. The evidence of identity depends upon a criticism of the text, which may be worth presenting in a future communication. J. A. BEGG.

PERSECUTION IN THE ISLAND OF MADEIRA.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The Beast, which was to make war against the saints, and prevail until the Ancient of Days should come, is now waging a terrible war against the converts in Madeira. Recent letters, received by some of our exiled Portuguese brethren, now in this country, give the sad intelligence, that some of the few converts who were not so happy as to follow their brethren into exile, have been persecuted to the death for Christ's and the Gospel's sake. I cannot here give all the details; but one sad case, that was witnessed by a number of people, will illustrate, and show what the spirit of Rome is, in those countries where it has full power to accomplish any evil deed. A beautiful young lady, in her teens, member of a very respectable family, by reading the Word of God in her own language, and by a kind word from an intimate female friend, who was a convert, was powerfully convicted of sin, and called upon the Lord Jesus Christ, the great Redeemer, for mercy. Prayer was also offered in her behalf by a few converts in secret, and the Lord spoke peace to her soul. Her joy was so great at her conversion, that she could not keep it to herself, but felt it her duty to inform her parents, whom she dearly loved, as one of the most affectionate of daughters. This she did, in hope that her father and mother might also, through grace, find the pearl of great price. With much anxiety for the salvation of her parents, (who worshiped all sorts of images and dead saints, the little wafer god, and other absurdities,) she opened all her heart, and gave them her happy experience in passing from death unto life. Unhappily, her deluded parents were under the power and charm of the priests and confessional. After hearing the experience, both parents gnashed their teeth, forbidding all farther intercourse with the Bible Christians, praying without the beads, reading the Scriptures, &c. They demanded immediate confession, and penance before the priest, upon pain of being whipped to death. The daughter and happy convert firmly, in a kind tone, declared her willingness to die rather than go back to the priests and the worship of idols, which God forbids in the second commandment. At this declaration, the father seized her, tied her to a tree in his garden, and, taking her at her word, whipped her to death. She died calling upon the Lord Jesus to bless and convert her parents. EXILE.

"DISCLOSURES," &c.

We have received from Auburn, N. Y., four numbers of a periodical entitled, "Disclosures from the Interior, and Superior Care or Mortals." What is the precise meaning of this unique and ominous title, is more than we can tell; but the general character of the periodical may be inferred from the following Prospectus, which we copy entire as one of the curiosities of psychological literature:—

"This Publication is dictated by Spirits out of the flesh, and by them edited, superintended and controlled.

"Its object is the disclosure of Truth from Heaven, guiding mankind into open vision of Paradise; open communication with spirits redeemed; and proper and progressive understanding of the Holy Scriptures, and of the merits of JESUS CHRIST, from whom they originated in inspiration absolute, and of whom they teach, as the only Saviour of a dissevered and bewildered race.

"The circle of Apostles and Prophets are its conductors from the Interior; holding control over its columns, and permitting no article to find place therein unless originated, dictated or admitted by them;—they acting under the direction of the Lord Supreme.

"James Congdon, Charles Coventry, Andrew L. Wilson and Lonson Bush are its Publishers and Proprietors; they having become, in full confidence of mind, disciples of the Lord; and being present external agents of the Circle Apostolic and Prophetic; acting under their direction, while faithful, as instruments for the distribution of truth."

There the reader has all the information in our possession as to the origin and design of this publication. As to the manner in which the spirits have done their editorial work, it may not become us mortals to be very critical. We will, however, venture to say, that they have not fully met our expectations. In the first number, for instance, we find an article "dictated by Paul the Apostolic Messenger," which strikes us as decidedly vapory and indefinite—entirely wanting, indeed, in that directness and terseness which characterized the writings of Paul the Apostle when in the flesh. The same may be said of some other communications which profess to come from spirits. Now, as we had always supposed that a transfer from this gross earth and its groveling associations to the spiritual state and the companionship of angels, would be refining and improving in its influence, this deterioration disappoints us. Perhaps, however, we were wrong in expecting such improvement in spirits. The fault may after all be in us.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 7.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

Voyage down the Lake—Squall at Night—Arrive at San Carlos—No boats to take us on our way—Ruins of the Fort—Night on the River—Rapids—Scenery on the San Juan—Another Night—Arrival at San Juan—Negro Police—Take Passage in the Brig Mechanic.

The schooner was nine feet beam and thirty-four feet keel, yet fifty men were crowded on board, until there was not room for us to be seated on the deck and keep our feet out of the water. The shores of the Lake are bold, and the navigation is easy. Once during the night a squall, attended by a brisk shower, visited us, parted the sheets, and in the confusion a cage full of parrots went overboard. We hugged close, and so kept warm, notwithstanding the water; and after thirty-six hours in this condition, we reached San Carlos, at the outlet of the Lake. The land was so distant that we could discern nothing of interest, except the Island of Ometepet, which rises from the Lake in a cone 7,000 feet high, and is slightly truncated by a crater. It is about midway of the Lake, and may be seen from either extremity. It was yet dark when we reached San Carlos, and landed in the mud. A few reed huts were all we could see to suggest a town; and I found my way into one where a light shone through the interstices. Some one had anticipated me, and provided himself with the only hammock in the house; so, having taken a dish of chocolate, I lay down on the earthen floor, with several billets of wood for a pillow; but while I was contending the point with the musquetoes, day broke. In the short distance of ninety miles which we had come from Grenada, the climate had undergone a great change. But little air was stirring here, and that was humid; in fact, it rains so frequently that the ground is kept miry, and vegetation is more luxuriant than at the upper end of the Lake.

There were no canoes here to take us down, as had been agreed; and as we had been imposed upon already by being crowded, contrary to agreement, we concluded that, as an act of justice, the schooner should go down the river. To give one an idea of the practices of Americans in this country, take this instance. The vessel had been got up the river with some difficulty, and was sold for $800 to run on the Lake, and she was engaged in carrying passengers to San Carlos, where an agent was stationed to forward them down the river in canoes. The fare asked is $25, of which $10 is generally paid to the proprietors of canoes for the river part of the route; and as it requires eleven days to ascend again with their boats, this is not an unreasonable compensation. While these are performing one trip, the schooner has made six, the profits of which will amount to the sum of $4,500. They agree to carry thirty only, and crowd fifty on board, and you may forfeit your passage money or submit. It was guarantied that there should be no delay on the route. Now we were told that we must wait until canoes should come up. We gave the agent to understand, that if there were no boats provided before noon, the schooner must fulfill the contract; and we held her in custody.

In the mean time, I took the opportunity to visit the ruins of the Spanish Fort that was built at this place. I had heard it represented as being the most extensive Spanish work of the kind on the continent. It was taken by Gen. Dalling in 1779, in whose expedition Lord Nelson, then Post-Captain, won distinction. It was held by the English until the pestilential atmosphere of the place had nearly exterminated their forces. Upon the extreme point of the promontory that commands the passage of the river, are the barracks, if they can be called by that name, and several heavy guns are lying on the ground, and a few pyramids of shot, but there is not a piece ready for service, and there seems but little encouragement to expend any thing on the place, as it could only serve to excite the cupidity of their enemies. There is one thirty-two-pounder brass gun mounted, one of those mementos of the glory of Old Spain, but spiked, no doubt to prevent its being turned upon themselves. I had given up the search for the old Fort of San Juan, thinking I had been deceived. The hill that commanded the vicinity was so heavily wooded that I had conceived it impossible that it should have been the site. As a last effort, I determined to reach this, and after laboring up through the most intricate labyrinth of trees and vines, I came to a rampart, and followed it for a long distance. A great number of heavy guns lay in the embrace of trees, and scattered over the entire work. The walls of many buildings are yet entire, but the air was so close and gloomy from the dense shade, that it was insupportable, and a swarm of hornets, whose nest was in the mouth of a big gun that I was inspecting, caused me to beat a retreat.

On returning, I found that one canoe had arrived. Twenty-three of us were stowed into this, besides the crew of five Indians, and we started just before sundown. The men at the oars seemed but little disposed to exert themselves, and we glided along not much faster than the current. The river was wider and deeper than I expected, but its banks were low, as is all the land on the east side of the Lake, like an irreclaimable jungle. As night shut in the view, we heard many cries of wild beasts, which the natives with us would imitate and pronounce "mucho malo." Our bungo was so crank that the most of us were compelled to sit down on the floor, and the least change of position, on the part of any one, would cause it to careen so far that the men on one side were unable to raise their oars out of the water. Overpowered with the want of sleep, we settled away, one by one, into every imaginable attitude simulating repose, but which was little more than a state of semi-insensibility in which we were aware of floating down the stream, and from our painful contortions of body were kept conscious of our personal identity. The rain poured down upon us without producing any other effect than when it falls upon the cottager's roof. The men seemed to sleep better for it. In this manner we continued until day-light, and were eighteen miles from San Carlos. The forest was heavier than that seen the day before, and rose in a dead wall from the water's edge. The current also was more rapid. We stopped at a place where the undergrowth had been cleared away to enable boats to land, for the sake of stretching our limbs and preparing breakfast. The earth was miry, and all was so wet that to build a fire was impossible. In fact, every thing on shore looked so gloomy and repulsive that we were glad to get back into our boat, and take a cold luncheon, washing it down with a bowl of "panola." This is a dish much used by the natives on journeys, and is made from Indian corn parched and ground. It is mixed with water in a calabash.

Soon after starting again, we heard the roar of water, and preparations were made to descend the rapid. The boatmen endeavored to impress us with the dangers of the passage; but, knowing their national characteristics, we thought that what they did not fear was not worth fearing. This rapid, which is the worst on the river, is about half a mile long, and runs about six miles an hour. One goes down it without apprehension.

Here was the first elevated ground we had seen since leaving San Carlos; and upon it stands the modern fort of St. Johns, taken from the Nicaraguans a few years since by the English. Beneath it, close to the water, is a small house, the only inhabited spot on the whole river, from the lake to the ocean. An American steamer was moored here, waiting for appliances to ascend the rapid. The current for the most of the day was swift, and we went along at a fine rate. The trees rose in a perpendicular wall of green to the height of from fifty to one hundred feet. Some showy flowers were seen, but were beyond our reach; also monkeys and macaws, both green and scarlet, but they seemed to hold us in great aversion. Alligators too were stretched along the shore, with their jaws set as a fly-trap for unwary insects. Not a breath of air was permitted to reach us, and the sun poured its hot displeasure upon us without even the "shadow of a shade." But we were kept tranquil by an occasional drenching of rain. We continued on until night again overtook us; and a severe night it was. The rains were more constant, and came in torrents, while the roar of the wind was as though all the demons of the forest were abroad. Our constrained position had now become positive torture; and, to make matters worse, a quarrel had broken out between the master of the bungo and the crew. At length they refused to pull another stroke. Persuasion and coërcion were fruitless, and we were drifting towards the shore and under the overhanging trees, broadside to the current. Should we catch against one of the limbs, nothing could prevent our being capsized, and compelled to choose between the alligators in the water and the ferocious beasts that were prowling in the forest. For myself, individually, I had obtained possession of a place on the bottom of the boat, where I could rest my head; and though I heard all that was passing, was so fatigued with the fourth night's watching, that I felt that if we were actually overboard, I should still insist upon a little sleep before I could consent to go on shore. At length two of the men resumed their oars; and as the day began to dawn, we heard a distant roar like the tramp of another storm in the forest. But the sound continued, and the rain came not. We concluded that we were near the surf on the sea shore. The river San Juan, near its mouth, makes an acute angle with the sea shore, so that we were nearer to it than to the mouth of the river.

This morning the character of the scenery was much changed. The shores were low, swampy, and covered by sickly-looking palm trees. We passed many boats on the river, and one party of European immigrants bound up a branch leading into the State of Costa Rica. About six o'clock we reached San Juan, or Greytown, as the English call it, and a more disgusting place one could not wish to see. It is on a low ridge separating the river from an impenetrable swamp. A few framed houses, and a flag-staff upon which the English colors were flying, designated the town; and on landing we were waited upon by a dozen of Her Majesty's colored troops, called policemen, requesting us, in behalf of the people of the town, to deliver up to their keeping any fire-arms we might have about us, until such time as we should leave the place. Some complied; others declined, and expressed a resolution to give them up only with their lives. The officer in command was white, and he told them it was not compulsory. This regulation seems to have given rise to some inflammatory language in political papers at home, but the intention was no doubt a good one. I have already alluded to the conduct of returning Californians, and at this place, where often hundreds of them were detained, they were liable to excesses which were dangerous to the lives and property of the inhabitants. And as to cut them off from ardent spirits would deprive a class of the people of one of their most productive sources of trade, the authorities proposed to disarm them. These black troops, it is well known, are kept here for the purpose of enforcing the jurisdiction over this place of an Indian styled the King of the Mosquitoes, but so miserably abject, that all their forces could not keep pantaloons on His Majesty; and he cares as little about the question of title to the country, as the alligators and monkeys that infest it.

There were but two small vessels in port when we arrived. One was an American brig, loaded with logwood and deer-skins. The British mail steamer had not arrived, and the war steamer stationed here had gone down to Chagres with several hundred passengers. The sickly, forbidding aspect of the place made us anxious to leave it as soon as possible. Another American brig arrived during the forenoon, which proved to be the "Mechanic," of Bath, Me.; and as soon as it was ascertained that she was up for passengers, we paid our fare to New Orleans, though that was not the port we preferred to sail to, and took up our lodgings on board. The cabin was small, and badly furnished; but it gave us a home, and for one night it might be said that we slept violently. The next day the schooner Maria arrived in fourteen days from New York; and home, with all its comforts, of the smallest of which we had been deprived so long, seemed almost at hand. But the severest trial that we had ever experienced was still before us. Two or three days were yet to be spent before we could sail, and in the mean time the English mail steamer and frigate arrived.

About this time Capt. Hutchinson, of the brig Union, arrived, having been picked up in an open boat, with his mate and two seamen. His brig had been wrecked about three weeks before, on Serrana Keys, bound from Chagres to New Orleans, with forty-five passengers. All hands reached shore in safety, and as the brig had worked over the reef, her stores were landed, and the company were as comfortable as they could be on a little bird island, without any prospect of relief. After eleven days the captain took the long boat, with a crew, and endeavored to reach an island about eighty miles to leeward; but owing to the same defect in his chart which had caused his wreck, he missed it, and after great suffering and peril was picked up on the Mosquito coast by a small schooner, and brought into San Juan. He made an arrangement with the agent of the Mechanic to go to Serrana and take off the men. We had already eighty persons on board, and as this was done without consulting the passengers, as the schooner Maria could be obtained, and as this enterprise appeared to be attended with great danger and delay, we complained of it as being a violation of the engagement with us, and, though we wished to put no obstacle in the way of relieving the men, we would prefer to take some other conveyance home. By dint of misrepresentations and persuasions, we were at length induced to continue on board, and the next day—Christmas day—we set sail.

THE SABBATH-KEEPING CHURCHES IN WISCONSIN.—A letter from Eld. Varnum Hull, who is now laboring with the church at Milton, Rock County, Wisconsin, gives a very cheering account of the condition of the churches in that State. The revival at Milton resulted in the conversion of some sixty persons, nearly all of whom have united with the church. Seventy-five persons have recently been added by baptism and letter, and others will probably join soon. There is also a good state of feeling in the church at Big Foot; some eight or ten persons have recently embraced the Sabbath there, and considerable interest on that subject is felt in the vicinity of the church. Faithful ministerial labor is much desired, and there is reason to think that it would result in great good. The church at Christiana has been somewhat revived, and several additions have been made.

THE SABBATH-KEEPING CHURCHES IN VIRGINIA.—A letter from Eld. Azor Estee, dated at West Union, Va., April 14, says: "My missionary labors the past winter have been very arduous, and I hope not altogether in vain. Twelve youth within the sphere of my labors have been baptized since my return from Ohio. The Churches at Lost Creek and Salem have each enjoyed a revival of religion, which, I trust, has not only added to their numerical strength, but improved their spiritual condition, and augmented their moral power."

Eld. Estee speaks of a Convention held in Salem, Harrison Co., at which the Virginia Seventh-day Baptist Association was organized. An account of the meeting, he says, was forwarded for the Recorder; but it has never come to hand. We hope he will send again.

PREACHING PRINTED SERMONS.—A statement is going the rounds, to the effect that Mr. Harper, recently appointed Vicar of Selby, after the usual morning service, took his place in his pulpit, and informed the congregation that he should that day commence a practice he had long intended to pursue, that of preaching a sermon not of his own composition, but written by another person. His reason for preferring this course was, that there were many sermons, by some of the oldest divines, which, in consequence of not being generally read, were comparatively useless.. A good reason, honestly stated.

METHODIST MISSIONS.—The New York Observer, giving a particular account of the missionary operations of the Methodist Episcopal Church, sums up thus:—

"The number of its missionaries in the foreign department, exclusive of printers, teachers, mechanics, &c., is 34; in the home department, including the Indian, German, and Swedish missions, 464. The number of church members connected with the foreign missions is 1,611; connected with the home missions, 38,882; total, 40,493."

POSTAGE ON THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR.—The Sabbath-School Visitor measures 270 square inches. According to the New Law, (under which the July and subsequent numbers will be sent out,) the postage on it will be one fourth the rate charged on ordinary monthlies, or those measuring more than 300 square inches. For any distance within 300 miles of New York, the postage will be 2½ cents a year; for any distance over 300 and under 1,000 miles, 3¾ cents; for any distance over 1,000 and under 2,000 miles, 5 cents; and so on. Until the New Law goes into effect, the Department is entitled to full postage on each copy of the paper, and not simply on each sheet, as was erroneously stated in the first number.

A NEW VOLUME AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.—The Eighth Volume of the Sabbath Recorder will commence about the middle of June—seven weeks from to-day. The paper will be printed on new type, and no pains will be spared to make it a stanch advocate of reform in general, a faithful record of Seventh-day Baptist denominational movements in particular, and an interesting and useful family newspaper. Now is the time to get new subscribers. Who will begin?

Free-Will Baptist Newspaper.—"The Morning Star," the organ of the Free-Will Baptist Denomination, comes to us this week in a new dress and enlarged form. From a historical sketch under the editorial head, we learn that the paper was commenced twenty-five years ago, "a small sheet, with a meager list of subscribers;" now it appears on "a large sized sheet, with nearly as many thousand subscribers as hundreds then." At first the paper was owned by a small company of brethren, and was published in a "hired room;" now it is the property of the denomination, and has "commodious and permanent buildings of its own." So much for perseverance and union. The first number of the enlarged Star contains a letter from J. B. Davis, one of its agents, which shows what individuals are doing for the paper, and indicates one cause of its success. We copy from that letter:—

"In looking over, I find I have sent you about FIFTY-FIVE new subscribers this last year. I set my mark at fifty. Now I set my number at fifty more the next year—I mean from the first of April, 1851. I have obtained, in a little over two years, one hundred and thirty-three new subscribers; and about all have paid in advance. Besides other business, I have paid the office in that time, for books and all, THREE HUNDRED DOLLARS.

"Some rules I have adopted. 1. I try to get all I can to take the Star, professor or non-professor, belonging to our denomination or not. 2. I always get new subscribers to pay within the first three months; this is the easiest and best for all. 3. I never use any money due the office, for any PURPOSE WHATEVER. 4. I always send when I get from three dollars to ten dollars. 5. I pay for all books when I take them from the office. 6. I collect all I can from old subscribers."

Meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society.—The following extract from a Circular of the American Anti-Slavery Society, suggests matter for serious reflection and inquiry on the part of every well-wisher of our country:—

"Hitherto, since the formation of the Society, the Annual Meeting has been uniformly held in the City of New York, and usually in the Broadway Tabernacle. So absolute, however, is the sway of the Slave Power in that city, and such the fear of mobocratic excesses, (stimulated by the 'Union Committee' on the one hand, and the lawless Rynders and his crew on the other,) that no meeting-house or hall in that great city can be procured, either for the love of liberty or for gold, for the accommodation of the Society. Neither in the adjacent city of Brooklyn can any suitable building be obtained for this purpose.

Leaving these cities to the historical infamy which awaits them, the Executive Committee, in accordance with the urgent request of the friends of impartial liberty in Western New York, hereby give notice, that the Seventeenth Annual Meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society will be held at Syracuse, N. Y., on Wednesday, May 7, commencing at 10 o'clock.

A Defender of the Sunday.—Some pious journalists have endeavored to make capital for the Sunday out of Montalembert's movement relative to it in the National Assembly of France. The following statement respecting this man—"the perpetual advocate of the Society of Jesuits"—is made by the Paris correspondent of the New Yorker. It may help to form an estimate of the good intended by and to be expected from this movement:—

"It is a matter of public notoriety, that M. de Montalembert, the head of the Jesuit party, though a married man, has several acknowledged mistresses, by two of whom he has numerous families; and though possessed of large property, he has so little respect for the claims of parentage, that a destitute orphan of his family and name, to the great surprise and scandal of his friends, applied last week to a public institution in this city for charitable assistance."

Bequests to Charity.—The will of the late Sarah Waldo, of Boston, was recently filed at the probate office in that city. It bears date of April 14, 1848, and after givin $15,800 to relatives and others, makes the following charitable bequests:—

N. Eng. Female Moral Reform Soc.	$3,000
Foreign Evangelical Society	6,000
American Protestant Society	6,000
American Bethel Society	6,000
American Colonization Society	6,000
Theological Seminary, Bangor	8,000
" " Andover	8,000
" " East Windsor	8,000

The American Home Missionary Society is made residuary legatee, and will probably receive a legacy much larger than any of those specifically named above.

Revival in Hamilton College.—A letter to the Independent from President North, dated April 7, says:—

"It will give you pleasure to learn that during the collegiate term which has just expired in this institution, there has been in progress a deeply interesting revival of religion; and that, as the fruit of this work of grace, there is reason to believe that many young men belonging to the several college classes have been brought savingly under the power of the Gospel."

The Heathen at our Door.—A writer for the Charleston Courier, who seems to understand the subject of which he speaks, makes the following startling announcement:

"I hazard the assertion, that throughout the bounds of our Synod, (South Carolina and Georgia,) there are at least 100,000 slaves, speaking the same language as ourselves, who never heard of the plan of salvation by a Redeemer."

The U. S. Mail Steamship Baltic sailed from New York for Liverpool, last week, with one hundred and ninety-nine passengers on board, including several distinguished citizens of New York. Horace Greeley, editor of the Tribune, was among them.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

The steamship America arrived at Boston on the 17th inst., with European news to April 5th. Excepting a decline in cotton, there is no news of importance.

In England the Russell ministry hold their position, and are getting through the business of Parliament with tolerable success. Resolutions for the renewal of the income tax have been agreed to in Parliament. A powerful Papal league has been formed in London. Apprehensions exist that foreigners in England are concocting a revolutionary scheme, which is to develop itself during the Great Exhibition. The matter was brought before Parliament, and in reply to inquiries put to members of the Cabinet, assurances were given that the Government was prepared for any emergency.

France is quiet, but anxiety amounting to alarm prevailed respecting the progress of Socialist principles in the capital and departments. The Receiver General's house in Lyons had been burned down and all his documents destroyed.

The Austrian papers represent the insurrection in Bosnia as acquiring new force. Fifteen thousand insurgents had assembled at Jaicza, and a murderous fight with the Sultan's troops had taken place in the close neighborhood of that town, in which the advantage seems to have remained on the side of the rebels. Several hundreds fell on both sides.

The steamer Atlantic had been removed to Huskinson's graving dock and minutely inspected by scientific men, all of whom report her to be in a perfect and satisfactory state.

Four Days Later.

The U. S. Mail steamer Pacific arrived at New York from Liverpool last Sabbath, having made the passage in nine days and twenty hours—the shortest passage ever made, by nearly half a day. She brings Liverpool dates to April 9. The following summary embraces every thing worth copying.

From France we have little news. There are constantly fresh reports of new ministerial combinations.

There has been a serious revolt at Sennaar, far in Upper Egypt, in which the Pacha of the Province and the Egyptian troops had all been massacred. Preparations were making at Cairo to dispatch troops to the scene of tumult.

Letters from Damascus, received in Constantinople on the 19th of March, state that several French travelers, among them M. de Rothschild, have been seized by the Bedouins and mulcted of 40,000 piastres by way of ransom.

A horrible accident occurred at Cologne on the 1st inst. A military magazine, where cartridges were being prepared, exploded, while upward of a hundred men were at work in it. Thirty-six sufferers, sadly scorched and mutilated, were conveyed to the hospital; an officer, two corporals, and seven men, were buried under the ruins.

There are later advices from the Cape of Good Hope. The forts of Cox and White had received assistance, both in troops and ammunition, which will prove of immense advantage in future operations. Upon the march of the colonial army through the enemy's country to their appointed destination, they met with some resistance from the Kaffirs, but a few shells soon baffled all opposition, and they were allowed to proceed almost without further molestation.

The piratical murderers of Mr. Fast, the Swedish Missionary at Fuchau, China, have not escaped unpunished. The acting Vice Consul at the port, Mr. Sinclair, brought the matter to the notice of the Mandarins, who acted with promptitude on the occasion, the principals being seized and executed, and the village of which they were natives burnt. A letter from Amoy of the 24th states that 28 of the pirates had been beheaded, and that others were upon their trial.

Ida Pfeifer arrived recently in Berlin from a voyage round the world, performed mostly by land. The unwearied traveler, who was compelled by the war now raging in Kaffraria to abandon her visit thither, intends to go to the Guinea coast to collect natural specimens for the European Museums.

The Cork Journals announce an epidemic among horses in that district, which is becoming almost as fatal as the malady which proved so destructive among cattle last year.

The heirs of Louis Phillippe are about to offer for sale the gallery of modern pictures in the Palais Royal.

The Upper Rhine has risen considerably; has caused partial inundation, and may do great damage.

Ten Days Later from California.

The steamer Prometheus, with ten days later news from California, arrived at New York from Chagres and San Juan on Sixth-day last. She reports nearly two million dollars in gold dust at Panama, received by the steamers Northerner and Antelope, which left San Francisco on the 15th of March.

On Wednesday morning, the 12th of March, a fire broke out at Nevada City, which originated in the bowling alley of Gates & Smith, and was supposed to be the work of an incendiary. From this place the fire extended in all directions with great rapidity, and continued to rage until the fairest part of the city was destroyed. Upward of 200 houses were either burned or torn down to stop further ravages. One man is missing, and it was supposed that he was burned in his own house. By this terrible calamity, over two thousand persons, including many families, have lost their all. It was impossible to ascertain, with any degree of accuracy, the total loss sustained, but it cannot be less than one million two hundred thousand dollars. This does not include the gold dust which was in the possession of individuals, and which it was impossible to save, so rapidly did the flames spread, which is estimated at one hundred thousand dollars more.

A fatal affray occurred at Sonora on the 13th of March, in which five men lost their lives, and four others were mortally wounded. It grew out of an attempt, on the part of some miners, to dig on a plot of ground which a Mr. Holden claimed as his property, and had under cultivation. Farther trouble was feared.

Lynching has been again resorted to by persons residing on the Cossumnes river. They caught two men, who gave their names as James Baxter, of Maine, and Charles Simmons, of Massachusetts, running off with stolen horses, tried them, and finding them guilty, at once hung them.

Provisions of all kinds are scarce at the diggings along Scott's River, and they are held at high prices. The packers are realizing large sums, while those who had large stocks previously laid in, are making fortunes. The prices of all kinds of stock, horses and mules, had advanced greatly at Trinidad, in consequence of the demand for packing purposes. They sold quite readily at from $200 to $450.

The northern mines on Trinity, Scott's, Klameth, and other rivers and creeks, still attract much attention. Many new rich placers are reported as having been discovered in various parts of the country.

The Legislature of New York Dissolved.

The session of the Legislature of New York came to an abrupt termination on Fifth-day last, April 17. A bill to complete the enlargement of the Erie, Genesee Valley, and Black River Canals, had been before the Legislature for some time, and had been strenuously opposed by the democratic members, on the ground of its supposed unconstitutionality. When the bill came up for final action in the Senate, and its passage into a law was considered certain, twelve Senators resigned. The Senate was thus left without a quorum; and after considerable talk and delay, adopted the following preamble and resolutions:—

Whereas, By the resignation of 12 members of the Senate a large portion of the electors of this State are unrepresented in that branch of the Legislature, and their views and interests in reference to the most important acts which are now pending or may be presented, cannot be expressed, and legislation under such circumstances would be in violation of the first principles of republican government; and whereas the number of Senators is so reduced by such resignation, and by absence, that it has been found, after repeated efforts, that the quorum required by the Constitution to be present at the passage of bills essential to the continuance of the Government, cannot be obtained. In order, therefore, to afford an opportunity for a full representation of the people in Senate,

Resolved, (if the Assembly concur,) That His Excellency, the Governor, be requested to convene the Legislature in extra session at such time and place as he may deem expedient to the interests of the State.

Resolved, (if the Assembly concur,) That the Legislature do now adjourn sine die.

The above preamble and resolutions were concurred in by the Assembly; and after the usual messages had been sent to the Governor, both Houses adjourned sine die.

The Governor has issued his proclamation requiring the Legislature to meet at the Capitol, in the city of Albany, on Tuesday, June 10th, at noon.

A Juvenile Murderer.—A couple of weeks ago the body of a little boy was found in a slaughter-house in Baltimore, with marks showing that he died by violence. Several days afterward a negro boy was arrested, who, according to the Baltimore Sun, gave the following account of the affair:—

He says that on Thursday evening he and John Rumpf were playing in the slaughter-house with a top which belonged to him. John himself knocked down the bar of the close pen door with a stick. After playing together, John lost the cord of the negro's top, and they left the slaughter-house and went up the alley. When in the alley he says he struck him on the back of the head with a white stone, making it bleed—he was not mad at him, but struck him because he would not give him his top cord. When he struck him, John commenced crying, and started down the alley to go home—he followed him and took him to the slaughter-house and they again went in and commenced playing, swinging by the rope of the tackle. Still John did not find his cord, and he struck him again with a stone on one side of the head, knocking him down in the corner. He fell on his back, with the back of his head on the old hickory broom found in the corner. While lying that way John covered his face with his hands, and he beat him over the hands. He then left him in the corner, and did not go back any more—he was crying when he left him. Says he struck John five or six times. He says he did not strike him with a stick or broom handle. He says he heard John groaning that night, and knew it was him. He had no quarrel, but only hit him because he would not give him his cord. This is about the substance.

Banking in New York.—An Act amending the Banking Act has passed the Legislature of the State of New York. It requires all Banks and Bankers, either Safety Fund or under the General Law, to appoint an Agent in New York, Albany, or Troy, to redeem their notes at ¼ per cent. discount. Any circulating notes presented at the counter of a Bank for redemption, and the coin not paid, must be held fifteen days, and then again presented for redemption, and if it shall be shown that the Bank, on the first presentation, offered in redemption of its notes, other bank notes at par in New York, or a draft on New York available at sight, the holder of such non-redeemed notes shall only be entitled to recover 7 per cent. interest in lieu of all damages. The effect of the law is to give the country Banks fifteen days in which to procure specie if the party running the Bank declines City Bank notes or a draft on New York, and forces the person demanding specie to visit the Bank twice. It cuts off also all expenses of protest, and reduces the interest, after non-redemption, from 14 to 7 per cent.

Railroad Arrangements between Albany and Buffalo.—The Albany Journal says that the following will be the arrangements for running trains between Albany and Buffalo for the present season, commencing the first of April.

The first Express train, running through in 12 hours, will leave at 7 A. M., and connect with boats for Detroit, in connection with the Michigan Central Railroad for Chicago; also with boats for Cleveland and Sandusky, to connect with the railroad direct for Cincinnati. This train will not take passengers to land this side of Utica. To accommodate the way travel on the Utica and Schenectady road, a way train will be run, leaving Albany at 6 A. M. This train will only take passengers for Schenectady, Utica, and the stations between Utica and Schenectady, and will not connect with any line going farther west.

The Great Western Mail train will leave at 9 A. M., landing passengers at all stations between Albany and Buffalo. The Emigrant train will leave at 11½ A. M. Accommodation Passenger and Express trains will leave at 2 P. M. Second Express train at 7 P. M. By this train, passengers lose no business time, arriving in Buffalo at 7½ next morning.

The trains are all arranged so as to connect with steamboats and lateral railroads or stages, to convey passengers with the greatest dispatch to any part of the West, North, or Canada.

SUMMARY.

A letter dated Kingston, R. I., April 11, says that the trial of John Collins, indicted with Tom Kanouse and Levi Cole for the robbery of the Phœnix Bank, Westerly, had just terminated. The Jury were out about two hours, and returned a verdict of guilty. The trial of Henry C. Dorsey was immediately commenced. He stands indicted for perjury in swearing falsely on behalf of Tom Kanouse, which took place in August last, in which the Jury could not agree; since which time Kanouse has been convicted, and is now sentenced to hard labor in the State prison for eight years.

In the Superior Court, last week, a verdict of $3,000 damages against the City was obtained by George Hutson and his wife. The plantiffs were riding in the Fourth-avenue, by the side of the Harlem Railroad, when the carriage and horses fell into a cut. The horses were killed, and the owner has recovered their value from the city. Mr. H., his wife and daughter were badly injured, and this suit was to recovered damages from the city.

Gov. Helm, of Kentucky, has vetoed the bill passed by the Legislature, conferring upon the corporate authorities of Bacon College the privilege of raising $50,000 by a lottery scheme. In his message, the Governor acknowledges that previously, as a member of the Legislature, he had voted for a lottery bill, and as Governor approved one. He is now, however, convinced that the system is contrary to morality and public good, and he is not only in favor of withholding such grants for the future, but even repealing those now in existence.

The Dakota Tawaxitku Kin, or "Dakota Friend," is the title of a seven-by-twelve sheet published at Milwaukee, in the language of the Dakota Indians. It is a monthly started by the Dakota Mission. The March number contains a number of articles in the Indian tongue, with English translations, and gives an interesting account of the Dakota tribe. There are now three Indian tribes in this country possessing types and printing presses—the Cherokees, Choctaws and Dakotas.

Mr. Prescott, the engineer of the Syracuse and Binghamton Railroad, has completed the survey of two routes from Syracuse to the summit—one through Onondaga Hollow, Cardiff, &c., the other by way of Jamesville and Sherman Hollow—and reports both as good routes, perfectly feasible, and with a grade in no place exceeding 50 feet to the mile.

Beside the information received by the Government, and that contained in private letters, which are now public, with reference to the projecting Cuban Expedition, the Spanish Minister has received very definite and very positive information of the existence of an extensive band of armed marauders now hovering on the Gulf coast and preparing for embarkation whenever the opportune moment shall arrive.

Religious services, in accordance with the recommendation of the Executive, were held in most of our churches, says the Bedford Mercury, on Thursday. As a sign of the times, it should be noticed, that several of our reverend clergy, either directly or indirectly, treated of the Fugitive Slave Law, and all of them avowed themselves, upon high Christian ground, its uncompromising opponents.

Passengers are now ticketed from Cincinnati to Buffalo, via Columbus and Cleveland, for ten dollars. After the 15th inst. the time between Cincinnati and New York city will be forty-eight hours. When the Erie railroad is finished to Dunkirk the time will be still farther reduced, and when the South Lake Shore road is finished from Cleveland to Dunkirk it will be about down to the minimum point, not much over twenty-four hours.

There was a severe storm on the seaboard of Massachusetts last week, which destroyed a large amount of property at various places. The most lamentable circumstance is the loss of the Minot's Ledge Light-House, with the two assistant keepers, Joseph Wilson and Joseph Antone. Eight other lives were probably lost off Deer Island, and the Government sea-wall was carried away.

An entire family, consisting of eight persons, was suddenly seized with severe illness at Staunton, Va., last week, occasioned by the culpable negligence of a servant in using arsenic in making biscuit instead of soda. Medical aid being promptly at hand, no serious injury resulted from the mistake.

The Bath (N. Y.) Courier says that most if not all of the contractors upon this end of the Buffalo and Conhocton Valley Railroad have broken ground on their respective sections, and are now fairly at work.

Died, at Columbus, Ohio, Feb. 20th, 1851, Mrs Lucy Thorndike Going, widow of the late Rev. Jonathan Going, D. D., the founder and first Corresponding Secretary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society.

Mr. J. L. Whipple, the distinguished daguerreotypist, has succeeded, with the aid of Mr. Bond, the Cambridge astronomer, in taking views of the surface of the moon, as it appears through the great telescope at the Observatory. The mountains and valleys of the moon are very distinctly defined on the plate, and it is believed that by the aid of these representations, taken at different phases of the moon, their hight and depth may be determined.

A colored man named Philip King was recently arrested in Baltimore, under an old Maryland law, on the charge of being a citizen of New York and coming into Maryland to settle. This law prohibits "any free negro" from coming into the State and remaining more than thirty days, under the penalty of a heavy fine, in default of the payment of which he can be sold to raise the amount.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, Thursday, April 17, says: The Jenny Lind excitement is unbounded—the city is full of strangers. Miss Lind is greeted nightly with overflowing houses. The proceeds of last night's concert were near $18,000—being $2,000 more than the first. Her five concerts here will not yield much less than $80,000.

Under the new Constitution of Kentucky, there are 5243 officers to be elected by the people! There are more than 10,000, probably 15,000 candidates, all of whom, except those for judicial stations, are expected to mount the stump. It is computed that the aggregate time spent in electioneering will equal 80,000 days!

The Postmaster General has decided that under the new postage law, which takes effect on the 1st of July, weekly papers only, are entitled to circulate in the mail free of postage, in the county where published, and that in estimating the various distances mentioned in the Act, the office of publication is the starting place, and not county lines.

The war with Mexico was far more expensive to the government than the last war with Great Britain. The expenses of the military and naval establishment during the five years, 1812-16, were $114,856,000; while those during the five years, 1845-49, were $148,699,900.

At a meeting held at Lancaster, Jefferson county, Indiana, it was resolved to call a Christian Anti-Slavery Convention at Indianapolis, on the 28th of next May, "to determine upon the proper and true course of Christian labor and action in the present crisis of the struggle and conflict with slaveholders and pro-slavery aggression."

The Home Mission Record notices the decease of Mrs. J. Jones, wife of Rev. J. Jones, a Missionary in Indiana, and of Mrs. J. A. Nash, within a few weeks after her arrival at Fort Desmoines, Iowa, to which place she accompanied her husband, a Missionary of the Society, last autumn.

The storm on our Eastern coast last week did immense damage. A large number of vessels were driven ashore, and from nearly every Massachusetts port we hear of property destroyed to the value of from ten to fifty thousand dollars each.

A man by the name of John Kinne, in the employment of the Watertown and Rome Railroad Company, was killed by the engine on Monday of last week—the first fatal accident, we believe, which has occurred on the road.

The Board of Aldermen in Boston last week refused the use of Faneuil Hall for a meeting to hear Daniel Webster.

DIED.

Miss Eunice A. Hoagland, eldest daughter of Mr. Abraham Hoagland, of the town of Howard, Steuben Co., N. Y., who was pursuing her studies at the Alfred Academy, died at that place, of typhoid fever, on the 19th of March, 1851, aged 25 years. Ever enjoying good health until two weeks previous to her death, and being a devoted follower of her Saviour, her prospects were fair for a long and useful life. But she was ripe for heaven; and the reaper came, that she might no longer be exposed to the chilling blasts of a stormy world. The multitude of mourning friends that gathered around her lifeless form, for a last lingering look, showed that her work was already done, and well done. She had been for many years a devoted member of the Presbyterian church. Her remains were taken to her native place, Howard, for interment.

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 16th inst., after a very brief illness, Mrs. Catharine Davis, widow of Jonathan Davis, of Cumberland Co., N. J. Mrs. Davis removed from the State of New Jersey some twenty five years since. She subsequently became a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, of which she remained a member until death. She gave satisfactory evidence of being prepared for her change, and had hope in her death. COM.

In Almond, N. Y., March 20th, 1851, Elizabeth, wife of Thomas Cottrell, in the twenty-seventh year of her age. Sister Cottrell was a worthy member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, and we trust she has gone to join the church triumphant.

In Albion, Dane Co., Wisconsin, March 26th, of inflammatory rheumatism, Moses Green, son of Eld. Ray Green, aged about 26 years. He was a member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y. V. H.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository,

[Conducted by B. B. Edwards, E. A. Park, and M. Stuart, of Andover; Dr. Robinson and H. B. Smith, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has been received in the short time which has elapsed since the union was made public, and the universal approbation of the measure which the publisher is daily receiving through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

Miscellaneous.

The New Free School Law of New York.

An Act to establish Free Schools throughout the State.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Common Schools in the several School Districts in this State shall be free to all persons residing in the District over five and under twenty-one years of age, as hereinafter provided. Persons not residents of a District may be admitted into the Schools kept therein, with the approbation, in writing, of the Trustees thereof, or a majority of them.

SEC. 2. There shall hereafter be raised by tax, in each and every year, upon the real and personal estate within this State, the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, which shall be levied, assessed and collected, in the mode prescribed by chapter thirteen, part first of the Revised Statutes, relating to the assessment and collection of taxes, and when collected shall be paid over to the respective County Treasurers, subject to the order of the State Superintendent of Common Schools.

SEC. 3. The State Superintendent of Common Schools shall ascertain the portion of said sum of eight hundred thousand dollars to be assessed and collected in each of the several Counties of this State, by dividing the said sum among the several Counties, according to the valuation of real and personal estate therein, as it shall appear by the assessment of the year next preceding the one in which said sum is to be raised, and shall certify to the Clerk of each County, before the tenth day of July in each year, the amount to be raised by tax in such County; and it shall be the duty of the several County Clerks of this State to deliver to the Board of Supervisors of their respective Counties, a copy of such certificate on the first day of their annual session, and the Board of Supervisors of each County shall assess such amount upon the real and personal estate of such County, in the manner provided by law for the assessment and collection of taxes.

SEC. 4. The State Superintendent of Common Schools shall, on or before the first day of January in every year, apportion and divide, or cause to be apportioned and divided one-third of the sum so raised by general tax, and one-third of all other moneys appropriated to the support of Common Schools, among the several School Districts, parts of Districts, and separate neighborhoods in this State, from which reports shall have been received in accordance with law, in the following manner, viz: to each separate neighborhood belonging to a school district in some adjoining State there shall be apportioned and paid a sum of money equal to thirty-three cents for each child in such neighborhood, (between the ages of four and twenty-one;) but the sum so to be apportioned and paid to any such neighborhood, shall in no case exceed the sum of twenty-four dollars, and the remainder of such one-third shall be apportioned and divided equally among the several districts; and the State Superintendent of Common Schools shall, by proper regulations and instructions to be prescribed by him, provide for the payment of such moneys to the Trustees of such separate neighborhoods and school districts.

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the State Superintendent of Common Schools, on or before the first day of January, in every year, to apportion and divide the remaining two-thirds of the said amount of eight hundred thousand dollars, together with the remaining two-thirds of all other moneys appropriated by the State for the support of Common Schools among the sevaral counties, cities and towns of the State, in the mode now prescribed by law for the division and apportionment of the income of the Common School fund; and the shares of the several towns and wards so apportioned and divided, shall be paid over, on and after the first Tuesday of February, in each year, to the several town Superintendents of Common Schools, and ward or city officers, entitled by law to receive the same, and shall be apportioned by them among the several school districts and parts of districts in their several towns and ward, according to the number of children between the ages of four and twenty-one years, residing in said districts and parts of districts, as the same shall have appeared from the last annual report of the Trustees; but no moneys shall be apportioned and paid to any district or part of a district, unless it shall appear from the last annual report of the Trustees that a school has been kept therein for at least six months during the year ending with the date of such report, by a duly qualified teacher, unless by special permission of the State Superintendent of Common Schools; excepting, also, that the first apportionment of money under this act shall be made to all school districts which were entitled to an apportionment of public money in the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine.

SEC. 6. Any balance required to be raised in any school district for the payment of teachers' wages, beyond the amount apportioned to such district by the previous provisions of this act, and other public moneys belonging to the district applicable to the payment of teachers' wages, shall be raised by rate bill to be made out by the Trustees against those sending to school, in proportion to the number of days and of children sent, to be ascertained by the teachers' list, and in making out such rate bill it shall be the duty of the Trustees to exempt, either wholly or in part, as they may deem expedient, such indigent inhabitants as may, in their judgment, be entitled to such exemption, and the amount of such exemption shall be added to the first tax list thereafter to be made out by the Trustees for district purposes, or shall be separately levied by them, as they shall deem most expedient.

SEC. 7. The same property which is exempt by section twenty-two of article two, title five, chapter six, part three of the Revised Statutes from levy and sale under execution, shall be exempt from levy and sale under any warrant to collect any rate bill for wages of teachers of Common Schools.

SEC. 8. Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or alter the provisions of any special act relating to schools in any of the incorporated cities or villages of this State, except so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions contained in the first, second, third and fourth sections of this act.

SEC. 9. Chapter one hundred and forty of the Session Laws of one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, entitled "An Act establishing Free Schools throughout the State," and chapter four hundred and four of the Session Laws of one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, entitled "An Act to amend an act entitled an act establishing Free Schools throughout the State," and sections sixteen, seventeen and eighteen of the Revised Statutes relating to Common Schools, requiring the several Boards of Supervisors to raise by tax, on each of the towns of their respective counties, a sum equal to the school moneys apportioned to such towns, and providing for its collection and payment, and all other provisions of law incompatible with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 10. The State Superintendent of Common Schools shall cause to be prepared, published and distributed among the several School Districts and School Officers of the State a copy of the several acts now in force relating to Common Schools, with such instructions, digest and expositions as he may deem expedient, and the expense incurred by him therefor shall be audited by the Controller and paid by the Treasurer.

SEC. 11. All the moneys received or appropriated by the provisions of this act shall be applied to the payment of Teachers' wages exclusively.

SEC. 12. It shall be the duty of the Trustees of the several School Districts in this State to make out and transmit to the Town Superintendent of the town in which their respective school-houses shall be located, on or before the first day of September next, a correct statement of the whole number of children residing in their District on the first day of August preceding the date of such report, between the ages of four and twenty-one; and such Town Superintendent shall embody such statement in a tabular form, and transmit the same to the County Clerk in sufficient season to enable the latter to incorporate the information thus obtained in the annual report required by him to be made to the State Superintendent of Common Schools for the present year.

SEC. 13. It shall also be the duty of the Trustees of the several school districts, in their annual reports thereafter to be made, to specify the number of children, between the aforesaid ages, residing in their respective districts on the last day of December in each year, instead of the number of such children between the ages of five and sixteen.

SEC. 14. This act shall take effect on the first day of May next; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to effect provisions already made in the several school districts for the support of schools therein under existing laws for the current year.

Extraordinary Avarice.

In the year 1792, an extraordinary instance of avarice occurred in France. A miser, of the name of Foscue, who had amassed enormous wealth by the most sordid parsimony and the most discreditable extortion, was requested by the Government to advance a sum of money as a loan. The miser, to whom the interest was not inducement sufficiently strong to enable him to part with his treasured gold, declared his incapacity to meet this demand; he pleaded severe losses and the utmost poverty. Fearing, however, that some of his neighbors, among whom he was very unpopular, would report his immense wealth to the Government, he applied his ingenuity to discover some effectual way of hiding his gold, should they attempt to institute a search to ascertain the truth or falsehood of his plea. With great care and secrecy he dug a deep cave in his cellar; to this receptacle for his treasure he descended by a ladder, and to the trap-door he attached a spring lock, so that, on shutting, it would fasten itself. By-and-by the miser disappeared; inquiries were made; the house was searched; woods were explored, and the ponds were dragged; but no Foscue could they find; and the gossips began to conclude that the miser had fled with his gold to some part, where, by living incognito, he would be free from the demands of the Government. Some time passed on; the house in which he had lived was sold, and workmen were busily employed in its repair. In the progress of their work, they met with the door of the secret cave, with the key in the lock outside. They threw back the door, and descended with a light. The first object upon which the lamp was reflected was the ghastly body of Foscue, the miser, and scattered around him were heavy bags of gold and ponderous chests of untold treasure; a candlestick lay beside him on the floor. This worshiper of mammon had gone into his cave to pay his devoirs to his golden god, and became a sacrifice to his devotion!

Washington an Englishman!

The Boston Transcript has recently published a letter, bearing date Isleworth, Middlesex, England, Feb. 25, 1851, and signed George Field, which adduces evidence in proof of the fact that George Washington was born in England.

It seems from Mr. Field's account that some seventy years since, when a boy, being accidentally in the neighborhood of Cockham, in Berks, a country cottage was pointed out to him as that in which the parents of General Washington resided, and from which they removed to America. He saw also a Mrs. Morer, who showed him the portrait of Mrs. Washington and other relics of the family, given to her when the family took their departure for America, whither, she said, his mother "took their son (George Washington) in her arms."

Some years after this, happening again into the same neighborhood, he called on Mrs. Morer, who again showed him the portrait, and said that two Americans, friends of Washington, had sought her out as the nearest relative of his nurse, and presented her with two guineas.

Again in 1812, hearing that Mrs. Morer was dead, and that her effects were to be sold at auction, Mr. Field bought all the pictures, and obtained the portrait in question, which he has no doubt is that of the mother of Washington, and in which a family likeness is to be traced.

A passage in Colton's "Lacon," vol. 2, p. 112, which is as follows, is quoted as corroborative evidence of the fact that Gen. Washington's parents emigrated after marriage, and probably enough, as Mr. Field suggests, brought him hither in their arms. Lacon might be wrong in his last paragraph, and right in his first:—

"If a private country gentleman in Cheshire, about the year 1730, had not been overturned in his carriage, it is extremely probable that America, instead of being a free republic at this moment, would have continued a dependent colony of England. This country gentleman happened to be Augustine Washington, Esq., who was thus accidentally thrown into the company of a lady, who afterwards became his wife, who emigrated with him to America, in the year 1732, at Virginia, and became the envied mother of George Washington the Great." Irrigation of Gardens.

From repeated experiments we are induced to draw the conclusion, that next to manure, the great prime mover in successful culture, there is nothing more important to vegetable growth in many cases, than irrigations. Practical gardeners, in countries far more moist than our own find it indispensable, and a large share of their success depends on copious waterings.

Some interesting instances, which recently occurred may be worth stating. Two rows of raspberries stand on ground in every respect alike, except that one receives the drippings from a wood-house and the other does not. The watered row is fully four times as large in growth as the other. Again—the berries on the bushes of the Fastolph and Franconia raspberries were, at least twice as large when the soil was kept moistened, as afterwards when allowed to become dry; a repetition of the watering again doubled their size. Again—a near neighbor, who cultivates strawberries for market, and who uses a water-cart for irrigating the rows, raised at the rate of one hundred and twenty bushels to the acre, on common good soil by this means; and he noticed that where the cart was left standing over night, so that the water gradually dripped from it, for some hours, upon a portion of the plant, the fruit had grown to double the size of the rest in twenty-four hours.

It should be observed that these advantages of a copious supply of water pertain chiefly to small or annual plants. The roots of fruit trees being larger and deeper, are to be supplied with moisture in a different way; that is, by a deep, rich, mellow soil, kept moist by cultivation, or by covering thickly with litter. Water applied to the surface rarely descends so low as the roots, and only harden the soil to a crust. [Alb. Cult.

PRESENT TO JENNY LIND.—The Firemen of New York City have purchased a splendid gold box, to contain a parchment copy of the vote of thanks passed by them to Jenny Lind, on account of her donation of $3,000 to the Fire Department Fund. The box is seven inches in length by three in width, and weighs twelve ounces. In the center of the lid is a scroll, bearing the inscription, "The Firemen of New York to Miss Jenny Lind, Sept. 13, 1850," surrounded by a wreath of oak and laurel. In the two upper corners of the box are engraved the initiation and discharge certificate of the Fire Department; the one surrounded by the flags of Sweden and America, with a lyre between; the other by the same flags and the appropriate emblems of the Firemen. The present from the Fire Department to Jenny Lind will consist of this box, together with a complete copy of Audubon's "Birds and Quadrupeds of America," both to be place in a miniature rosewood book-case of exquisite workmanship. The monies for the purchase of this present were raised by individual subscription among the members of the Department. The presentation will be made upon the return of Miss Lind to this City.

RAILROADS IN MASSACHUSETTS.—The Boston Transcript has compiled a table from the several Railroad Reports to the Legislature in 1848, '49 and '50, showing the operation of twenty-five Eastern Railroads during that time. During the years named 25,594,000 persons were carried over them, or a number nearly equal to the population of the United States. The number carried in 1848 was 7,333,870; 1849, 8,633,230; and 1850, 8,973,631. The cost of fifteen of the roads, named in the table, on the 1st of January, 1848, (the others not being completed at that time,) was $34,038,700; Jan. 1, 1851, $41,055,200. Increase in three years, $7,016,500. The net earnings of the same roads in 1847 were $2,564,190; in 1850, $3,032,789. Increase, $468,598. The net earnings of the whole number during the year 1848 were $2,785,897; in 1849, $3,115,420; in 1850, $3,480,347. The gross receipts in 1848 were $5,908,144; in 1849, $6,421,967; and in 1850, $6,903,328. Their total length, including branches, is 1,120 miles.

COLONIZATION STATISTICS.—The annual report of the American Colonization Society, (says the Independent,) contains tables showing the whole number of passengers sent out by that Society and its auxiliaries since 1820 to be 6,116, being about 200 a year. Of these, 2,258, more than one-third, were from Virginia, 42 from New England, 107 from New York, and 1181 from the Western slave States. Of the whole, 2,315 were born free, 165 purchased their freedom, 3,636 were emancipated to be sent off, and 1,044 were liberated Africans, including 750 from the "Pons." About 800 persons have been sent by the Maryland Society, making nearly 7,000 in all. The expense of the Society was $913,636, and independent State Societies, $312,000; making about a million and a quarter, and averaging $170 to each emigrant. This does not include the sums expended by missionary and other societies giving in part to support the colony. The whole not falling short of three millions.

STATISTICS OF LAWYERS.—Livingston's Law Register contains the name and address of every lawyer in the United States, compiled from official returns obtained from the clerks, recording officers, and sheriffs of the various counties. The whole number of lawyers in the United States, according to this work, is 21,979. In the opinion of the Editor, the annual practice of each lawyer averages $1,500, making the total income of the profession $31,500,000 a year, allowing for about one thousand who have retired from the Bar. The number of lawyers in the State of New York is 4,374, in Massachusetts 1,040, in Minnesota only 25.

Change and Exchange.

He is but the wreck of his former self,
And a shocking wreck is he;
With his tattered clothes and his battered nose,
And a gait like a ship at sea.

Once he was neat and trimly drest,
The pride of his father's hall;
And proud was the heart of his sweet young wife,
Who loved him better than all;

Better than all the world beside,
But now her heart is cold;
Oh! could she see this worthless drop,
That once was dearer than gold!

And whence, you ask, did this fatal change,
This sin and misery come?
It came, alas! from a single cause,
And that single cause was—RUM!

For this he gave up all he had and was,
And all that he loved the best;
He exchanged them all for this shaft of death,
That he presses still to his breast.

And was it, think you, a wise exchange
That this wretched being made?
If you do, just begin to tipple and drink,
And you'll soon make the very same trade.

BREVITY IN WOMEN.—"I encountered today in a ravine, (says a California letter,) some three miles distant, among the gold-washers, a woman from San Jose. She was at work with a large wooden bowl by the side of the stream. I asked her how long she had been there, and how much gold she averaged a day. She replied, 'Three weeks and an ounce.' Her reply reminded me of an anecdote of the late Judge B——, who met a girl returning from market, and asked her, 'How deep did you find the stream?—what did you get for your butter?' 'Up to the knee and ninepence,' was the reply. 'Ah!' said the judge to himself, 'she is the girl for me; no words lost there;' turned back, proposed, was accepted, and married the next week; and a more happy couple the conjugal bonds never united; the nuptial lamp never waned; its ray was steady and clear to the last."

THE DUCK PLANT.—This plant, which is known botanically by the appellation of Akistolochia Fatida, is perhaps one of the most remarkable productions of nature. It is described as "a tall, bold vine, with heart-shaped leaves," and bearing a flower "having a most striking resemblance, in body, throat, and bill, to a duck floating tranquilly on some mirrored lake. This duck-shaped flower is eighteen inches in length, and sixteen and a half inches in circumference of body, seven inches in length of head, and with a slender or switchy length of tail behind, measuring twenty-four inches. The inside of the calyx is superbly mottled and variegated with rich colors, somewhat like the interior of a preserved ocean shell, but neither so brilliant nor so red, but somewhat of a purple cast." One of these plants was some time since exhibited in Charleston, and was contemplated with astonishment by many. [Burlington Courier.

EXPERIMENTING.—A gentleman in England intends covering a large barn on his farm at Heavitree with a glass roof, after the model of the palace of glass. It is to be 110 feet long and 28 wide. It is said the expense will be above two-thirds of the cost of slate, and he anticipates several advantages from the novel roof; among others, it may be applied to the drying corn during a catching harvest. The corn can be placed in the barn immediatly upon being reaped, by which means it will have the benefit of the sun when it shines, be protected from the showers, and dried by artificial heat, if required, and then stacked in ricks under a covered stack-yard. He will next sow the land with turnip or rape, and so get three crops in one year.

MULES VS. HORSES.—A correspondent of the South Carolina Farmer and Planter, who appears to have had much experience in raising mules and horses, states that he has kept a particular account of the expenses of each for the last ten years, and he says, "in no instance have I ever been able to bring the horse to the plow, for less than fifty to sixty dollars; and on the other hand, I have invariably brought the mule to collar for twenty to twenty-five dollars." In regard to the comparative expense of keeping, he says "the mule can be kept in as good condition as the horse, and will perform the same labor, however severe, in the same time and on about one-half the feed." In addition to this, the mule will outlive the horse fifteen to twenty years, and is seldom sick or crippled.

SEEDING FOR GRASS WITH OAT CROP.—Some ten years ago, I called on a friend in a neighboring town, when the conversation turned on the subject of grass seed not catching well with oats. He informed me, that his did as well with oats as any other grain. I went with him to his field of oats, and a handsomer crop I never saw, and a better catch of clover, when he informed me, that he never sowed over two bushels to the acre. I have seen numerous experiments made on rich land, and in all cases it has given satisfaction. There is but little danger of oats lodging with two bushels of seed to the acre; poor land may require more, but we should advise not to sow over two bushels to the acre.

GREASE FOR CARTS, &c.—The following composition is recommended by a writer in the Independence Belge for greasing carts and other agricultural implements:—Take 4 lbs. of caoutchouc dissolved in a proper liquid, 1 lb. of gelatine, 10 lbs. of carbonate of soda, 45 quarts of animal vegetable oil, and as much water; boil the water with the carbonate of soda and gelatine, then add the caoutchouc and the oil, stir the mixture well until it forms a homogeneous liquid. The above proportions may be varied; and if the caoutchouc and oil are previously purified, the carbonate of soda is unnecessary. The above mixture will be found very useful, not only for greasing carts, &c., but also for keeping the farm harness in order

TO IRON SILK.—Silk cannot be ironed smoothly so as to press out all the creases, without first sprinkling it with water and rolling it up tightly in a towel—letting it rest for an hour or two. If the iron is the least too hot it will injure the color, and it should first be tried on an old piece of silk. Bright colored silks or ribbons, such as pinks, yellows, greens, &c., always change color on the application of an iron. Blacks, browns, olives, gray, &c., generally look very well after ironing. Silks should always be ironed on the wrong side.

TO PREVENT SNEEZING.—A correspondent of the London Medical Gazette states, that to close the nostril with the thumb and finger during expiration, leaving them free during inspiration, will relieve a fit of coughing in a short time. In addition to the above, we state from personal knowledge, that to press the finger on the upper lip just below the nose, will make the severest premonitory symptoms of a sneeze pass off harmless. We have found the remedy useful many a time in creeping on game in the woods.

REMEDY FOR HORSE HOOF BOUND.—Mix equal parts of tar and some soft grease, having the foot clean and dry; apply it hot, but not boiling, to all parts, letting it run under the shoe as much as possible. In bad cases, the application should be made every day for a week, and then two or three times a week, till the foot becomes strong and smooth.

Variety.

A new material for boots and shoes has just come up in England. It is called the Pannas-Corium, or leather-cloth, and was invented by a person named Hall. The material is cotton, but has the mass and general appearance of leather, and receives a polish from ordinary blacking in the same way. It is used only for the upper, the sole being leather. It is said to be as durable as leather, never cracks or splits, and possesses the advantage of not drawing the feet.

One of the principal coach-makers of Paris has received an order from the Egyptian government to build fifty diligence omnibuses, for transporting passengers across the desert. These carriages, which are to be constructed on a new model, will combine comfort and solidity. The line which they will have to serve has been completely established, and the number of travelers who take this route to India increases every year.

Immense numbers of cattle and horses, so wild that they feed at night and lie hidden by day, inhabit the valleys and canyons of the Sierra Azel or Blue Mountains of California. Capt. LETTER FROM BRO. NATHAN WARDNER.

SHANGHAI, Jan. 14, 1851.

To the Board of the S. D. B. Missionary Society:—

DEAR BRETHREN,—Another year has gone, and still the Saviour stands beckoning the weary sinner to his kind embrace. Yet millions on millions are rushing to the grave, ignorant of his name and of his love. As the day of grace is drawing to its close, compliance with his last commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," seems to be increasing in importance. If God has chosen us as laborers in his harvest, what diligence does it become us to use, that a few, at least, may be gathered in, before that awful storm now impending shall come, and mercy's door be closed forever. Thrilling as such a reflection is, and however much it calls for energetic action, the reproving pen of conscience writes "delinquency" on every page of my history, and that too with the startling assurance that the wailings of lost souls will echo it back to all eternity. My prayer to God is, that no laborer in his vineyard may ever deserve and feel the force of such a charge. Much reason have I to fear lest my doings have tended more to scatter than to gather into his garner. Yet far be it from me designedly to oppose God's will, or wish myself where he does not wish me, knowing that his power can bring good out of evil and light out of darkness. The work is his, and all needed instruments are in his hands; and while sloth will be visited by his just indignation, still his work will progress, his gospel will be preached, and his name exalted among the heathen.

Would that we had a more cheering account to give of his wonder-workings in this benighted land. But the prince of darkness clings to his prey with a fiendish grasp, seeming to claim it as his right to reign. Anxiously do we look for a stronger than he to come, who, asserting his lawful supremacy, shall deliver this host of captives from under his tyrannizing power. This the enemy seems to anticipate and dread. His forces are now being marshaled for the contest, and his emissaries are on the alert. But in spite of all his zeal and princely power, the knowledge of God is spreading; and though His just claim to supremacy is more rarely acknowledged than treated with contempt, still we can but hope, that many a spiritual stone will be chosen from Sinim's treasury to enlarge and beautify the temple of the living God. The name of Jesus is on the tongue of thousands. We hear it constantly as we go about among the people. And though it be used with idol profanity and bigoted contempt, and his doctrines derided as folly, still they are communicated from one to another, (though frequently much distorted) and he will be glorified thereby.

As to labors, I have to say, that most of my time and energies have been devoted to the language. Since I last wrote, Bro. C. has published a couple of thousand copies of a Catechism containing about thirty-four pages. I have just had two thousand copies of a tract published, which contains the ten commandments with commentary, and also some general and practical remarks on natural and revealed religion, the plan of salvation, &c., consisting of about twenty pages; and I intend getting two thousand copies more printed soon. We have meetings in our chapel three times each week, as usual, and our teachers take part in the exercises, each once in two weeks. Bro. C. is in the habit of going daily to a little hamlet about two miles out of the city, where he preaches in a tea-shop. He is accompanied by his teacher every other day. I am in the habit of spending a portion of each evening in the tea-shops nearer home; and frequently am accompanied by my teacher. Those in the city seem more averse to hearing the doctrine than those in the country, so that some discretion is necessary in prosecuting this labor. When people come to the chapel, they expect to listen quietly to what we have to say; but when we go upon their premises, they feel less restraint. For once or twice they will generally listen with attention, and apparent interest, and it too frequently proves to be in appearance only, prompted by their ideas of politeness. But if they see us inclined to persevere, their politeness is liable to give place to other feelings, which manifest themselves in various ways—perhaps by drowning our voices, or turning our remarks into ridicule. Should we content ourselves to talk about the "Flowery Flag Country," its productions, customs, and improvements, whether the inhabitants smoke opium, and whether it has the same sun that China has, and what liberties would be allowed to a Chinaman, its distance, &c., &c., and also pay a "meritorious" price for the tea we drink, they would be sure to welcome us very cordially. But if they find us determined to make religion our theme, they seem more willing to dispense with our company. The rules of Chinese politeness require one to refrain from saying any thing in conversation contrary to the opinions of the hearer, but to flatter him and compliment his sentiments. But in preaching salvation through Christ alone, we are obliged at every step to oppose their prejudices, and condemn their practices; and thus we become violators of that rule which they hold in the highest estimation.

It is a remark of one of the oldest missionaries in China, that "this people are an impenetrable set." It is surprising at times to see the degree of perfection which they have attained in the practice of deception, and the shrewdness which men of the smallest capacities exhibit in that line. It is seldom one can be found as skillful in any thing else. This makes it extremely difficult to produce any serious impression upon their minds. Being led by selfish motives themselves, it seems hard for them to believe that we are prompted by any different motive. They think there must be some under-current of selfishness to prompt us. The complaint of Isaiah may well be adopted by every ambassador of Christ to this people, "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed."

The love of money seems to be the mainspring of all their religious ceremonies. Though they frequently go to considerable expense in keeping up their forms of devotion, yet I doubt whether they ever do it except with the hope of being rewarded with usury by the object or objects of their worship. And too often are we pained to see this mercenary spirit showing itself in those who profess to be interested in the religion of Jesus Christ. When a Chinaman shows any particular interest in the doctrine, we generally expect, as a matter of course, to be applied to for employment, or a loan of money, or a proposition to come and learn the doctrine and live at our expense, or to hear some pitiful tale of distress, or eventually to discover some scheme maturing for the accomplishment of some worldly end. And often their interest ceases when these prospects are cut off. Several cases of recent occurrence might be adduced in corroboration of this. A few loaves and fishes would make any number of disciples to the Christian religion in China, and perhaps as many more would convert them back to heathenism again. We hope, however, that there are some noble exceptions to this; still it is a trembling hope we can indulge for the most promising. But we know that there is power in the gospel, and that whoever embraces it in the love of it, will eventually be sanctified thereby. In dealing with such a people, one truly needs the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove; and still he will be compelled to say, not by wisdom nor by power, but by the Spirit of Almighty God, must they be won to Christ.

In the commercial dealings of the Chinese, a regular system of fraud is practiced. They have a variety in their weights and measures and rates of exchange, so that they are always prepared to impose upon the simple, and those unacquainted with their habits. A pound varies from twelve to eighteen ounces, although sixteen is the lawful standard. Their copper coin is strung professedly in bunches of a hundred each, though they frequently fall short several cash. Some contain the requisite number, but are interspersed with small counterfeit pieces. The price of articles, and the value of dollars, varies according to the number of ounces to the pound and rate of exchange; and yet the purchaser is never safe unless he carries his own scales with him. Foreigners are regarded as clear gain; and if they can succeed in cheating them, they not only exult in their own superiority, but seem to regard whatever they can get, in any way, as their right, and anger instead of shame is frequently exhibited when their plans are frustrated. Special favors, or presents conferred upon those in the employment of foreigners, are at first generally received with apparent gratitude; but afterwards they are apt to expect them as a settled arrangement, and often appear dissatisfied if they are not continued and increased. As a general thing, the more leniency and liberality is shown them, over and above what is their just due, the less gratitude, and the more impertinence and unwarrantable liberties are to be expected in return. To condescend to explain to them the reasons for wishing things done thus and so, is apt to be regarded in the light of a consultation, and afterwards it would not be wonderful if they should act as dictators and prompters, as though they themselves were the overseers. A market-man is always expected to avail himself of the above-named advantages, and take a handsome percentage in addition to his wages.

These remarks are not made with any wish to be censorious, but to illustrate to some extent the character of this people, and the difficulties and perplexities which the missionary meets on every hand, and in how many ways he is distracted and put to his wit's end. Still, familiarity with the real character of a heathen people tends to increase the sympathies of Christians for them, as it is because of their degradation that they should be cared for, and the gospel preached to them. It is not sufficient that missionaries preach and distribute religious books, &c. This ought to be done, while there are other things which should not be left undone. The Chinese are shrewd observers, and quick to draw conclusions from what they see. But little of primitive self-sacrificing religion may be expected to show itself among the Chinese Christians, till they have the example set for them by their teachers. Hence I am inclined to think that large salaries are generally a detriment to the missionary cause. The smallest amount mentioned in your letter a few months ago, is quite sufficient, I think, for a missionary and his wife. What other funds can be furnished, should, in my opinion, be appropriated directly to the prosecution of the work.

The Committee for Revising the Chinese Scriptures, having completed the New Testament, are now at work upon the Old. The books of Genesis and Exodus, I understand, are about finished. There are some passages in the New Testament so rendered that we shall be obliged to protest against them, and which will probably render the version useless to us, unless we rectify those passages by comment. But on the whole this version is quite an improvement upon any former one. The term to be used in rendering God is still a matter of discussion. The members of the London Mission, who a few months ago abandoned Shangtee, and adopted the Hebrew term Eloah, have returned again to Shangtee, and are printing the New Testament with that term. The question is now being discussed more ably than at any former period; and I can but hope the time will come when Shin will be universally adopted. The Chinese say there were formerly three Shangtees, who, becoming weary of overseeing the affairs of so great a world, appointed "Nyo Wong Shangtee" to manage these affairs in their stead; that his mother was operated upon in a miraculous manner by the Holy Spirit, about the time of his conception, and at that time she also saw a vision by which it was known that he was to become a god.

Near Canton, several Catholics were imprisoned, a few months ago, for their religion; after which an edict was issued by the chief magistrate of that place against preaching the gospel. At "Foo-Chow" another missionary has fallen by pirates, of which you will probably learn before this reaches you, and also of the death of Rev. J. G. Bridgman of Canton.

I lately received a letter from Mr. Dean, who had just returned from Bang Hkok, where it seems he left things in rather an encouraging state. Several were baptized during his stay, and several others were inquiring what they should do to be saved.

My teacher states that there was a severe earthquake not long ago, a few thousand lee from here, and a large city destroyed, with many of its inhabitants.

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

Reply to "Exodus"—Part 3.

> "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven" Matt. 5: 20.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—I snatch time from repose to finish my reply to "Exodus." Some of my friends have been pleased to express their approval of my last article on all points but one—its length. But it seems to me, on this score, you have the best right to complain. I do not wish to abuse your forbearance. Well-considered brevity does give to a discourse new force and beauty. But, give me the full length living man, even of large proportions, rather than the mummy regularly embalmed, shrunk and shortened! Some others of my friends think that I have treated "Exodus" with too much indulgence. I wonder whether such, if aiming at the front of the defying Philistine, would, like David, have chosen the smooth stones from the brook. All tastes cannot be satisfied. I prefer the smooth stones, the free hand, and the full sweep of the sling. But wisdom is profitable to direct, especially "the wisdom which is from above; which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace." (James iii. 17, 18.) May that wisdom from above be given to me in this discussion, and also to my friend!

5. The fifth proposition defended by my friend "Exodus" is, that "the Sabbath was formally abrogated by the first council at Jerusalem."

I had said of this at first, "It is a pure assumption, without a shadow of proof. I meet it with an unequivocal denial." My friend "Exodus," it appears, thinks my brevity here even too laconic. So easy it is in argument to err on either side, of fullness or conciseness.

It is, doubtless, very kind in him to "refresh my memory" with the history of that "important judicial deliberation." Though I studied it with some care about thirty years ago, (when, perhaps, my friend was in his cradle,) yet I am getting somewhat old and forgetful. But, to be serious, I am really obliged to him for presenting so clear and concise a statement of the circumstances and occasion of that first Church Council. It is in the main so good, that I accept it with pleasure, waving any verbal criticism on the ambiguous phrase, "to invoke the authority of the Catholic Church." Substantially, though not in form, this was a "general council;" not because all the churches then in Syria, Cilicia, and Palestine, were represented by chosen delegates, but because "the Apostles" were present, together with "the elders" and "the brethren" of Jerusalem. My friend says, "The great subject presented for the consideration and adjudication of this general council, was evidently the whole 'law of Moses,' and the extent of its obligation." (Acts xv. 5.) Precisely so. "And the decision arrived at, 'after there had been much disputing,' excepted from abrogation (says my friend) but three prohibitions of the law, as 'necessary things' to be abstained from; namely, idolatry, fornication, and the eating of things strangled and blood." Very true. He adds, "As Paley very correctly states, 'the observance of the Sabbath was not one of the articles enjoined by the Apostles, in the fifteenth chapter of Acts, upon them which from among the Gentiles were turned to God.'" Here is a fair statement of the case. And what then? How does it bear upon the fifth proposition, "that the Sabbath was then formally abrogated?"

This "Exodus" proposes to show. I had said at first that this decision does not affect the original 'law of the Sabbath,' and that 'the key to the whole fallacy (in this fifth proposition) is in the wrong sense given by the writer to the term Law.' But this "Exodus" does not admit. "The whole context above (he says) shows incontrovertibly that the ecclesiastical decree was not restricted to the Jewish ceremonial law, by its actually specifying two provisions of the moral law." He then adds, on my statement, "So wrong a sense given to the term 'Law,' by my friend, is really worse than a fallacy!" Here, then, we are fairly at issue.

My friend's argument is ingenious and plausible. It is put together with skill, and to his own mind was no doubt "incontrovertible." But I must take the liberty to examine both its form, its materials, and its strength. Analyzed, it stands thus: POSITION—The term Law is not here to be restricted to the ceremonial law of the Jews, but includes also the Decalogue. PROOF—1. The phrase (verse 5) "Law of Moses" means the whole Law. 2. Two commands of the moral law are specified. 3. Gentiles were never bound by the Law of the Sabbath. 4. The Law of the Sabbath would have been not a little burdensome to them. 5. The whole Law of Moses was abrogated (as to the Gentiles) except in three points, neither of which includes the Sabbath. CONCLUSION—Therefore "it is impossible" that the term can be restricted, or that the Law of the Sabbath can be obligatory on Gentile Christians. Nor is this conclusion set aside, even if a restriction of the term were conceded; for the Law of the Sabbath has been already proved to be ceremonial, (proposition 2d;) therefore the abrogation of the ceremonial law alone would abrogate the Sabbath, and this conclusion again is strengthened by subsequent facts. For—1. The Gentile Christians, on learning the apostolic decision, "rejoiced for the consolation." 2. They kept no Sabbath; but met only on the morning of the first day of the week, employing the rest of the day in ordinary work. 3. The Jewish Christians did the same, only that they still kept the seventh day Sabbath. The conclusion of the whole is, that the abrogation of the Sabbath, by this Council, is "as certain and distinct" as that of Circumcision. And in this conclusion Bishop Warburton and John Bunyan, as well as Dr. Paley, agree.

Presuming "Exodus" will admit this as a fair analysis of his argument, let us now try the strength of his proofs. 1. Does the phrase "Law of Moses" necessarily include the Decalogue? Is it not often used in Scripture DISTINCTIVELY; i. e., with special reference to the ceremonial and civil code which was given after the Decalogue, and was distinguished from it by three most significant circumstances—neither being uttered by the voice of God, nor engraved on the two tables of stone, nor laid up under the Mercy Seat in the sacred Ark of the Covenant? I think this distinction will appear in the very first use of the phrase. Deut. xxxi. 9—13. See also 1 Kings ii. 3. Acts xxi. 20—25. Heb. x. 28. Now if this distinctive use be found in any case, surely it may be admitted in this chapter under discussion. For who wished to enforce this law? The Judaizing teachers—the sticklers for circumcision, (verses 1st, 5th, and 24th) —men whom Peter describes as tempting God to put upon the Gentiles "a yoke which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear." Now this "yoke" can only include what was distinctive of Judaism. It cannot include the Law of God, which He has promised to "put into the hearts" of his people, "the royal law of liberty," that law of which Paul says, "I delight in the Law of God after the inward man." The first proof of "Exodus," then, is fallacious.

But—2. "Two provisions of the moral law," he says, "are specified—those against idolatry and fornication. And is not this fact decisive?" Not at all. For they are not specified as parts of the law in dispute, but only as "things necessary," in the peculiar condition of Gentile Christians, to be specially observed. Even "Exodus" is compelled to admit this, not perceiving that it ruins his argument. "The obvious reason why these two points of the moral law were at all referred to," he says, "was that they were the only ones likely to be transgressed by those just emancipated from Roman Paganism. Otherwise they would no more have been noticed than robbery or murder." I thank my friend for this honest confession of the truth. It shows that after all his heart is sounder than his logic. For look at the consequence to his argument. His argument is—"Nothing was enjoined on the Gentiles but these three necessary things, abstinence from idolatry, from fornication, and from the blood of things strangled. Therefore, the Sabbath was not enjoined upon them." Now apply this argument to any other commandment of the Decalogue, and see what it comes to. "Nothing was enjoined upon the Gentiles but the three things specified in this Apostolic decree. Therefore, all the ten commandments, except the first and the seventh, are abrogated." That is to say, profaneness towards God, disobedience to parents, lying, "robbery and murder," are no longer sins under the Christian dispensation! And this, then, is the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free!—even that Christ who said, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets!" To what absurd results will wrong theories, logically pursued, lead intelligent men!

But—3d. The "Gentiles were never bound by the Law of the Sabbath," says "Exodus." Pure assumption. A mistake in fact, which I have already exposed in Part I. of this reply.

But—4th. "The Law of the Sabbath would have been not a little burdensome to them," says my friend. Another assumption. The Gentile Christians of that age, as in this, must have esteemed the Sabbath a delight, not a burden. Cases of trial, as of Christian servants bound to Jewish or Heathen masters, might occur, yet these were exceptions rather of form than of feeling; nor were such exceptions confined to the fourth commandment. The rule is set forth in prophecy, (Isai. lvi. 5—8,) by the voice of God himself. "Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord, to serve him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be his servants; every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant; even them will I, bring into my holy mountain, and and make them joyful in my house of prayer," &c.

But, says my friend, in the fifth place, "The whole Law of Moses was abrogated as to the Gentiles, except in three points, neither of which includes the Sabbath; therefore it is impossible that the term can be restricted, or that the Law of the Sabbath can be obligatory to Gentile Christians." My friend's impossibilities are both purely imaginary. I have shown that the term is restricted, both by Scripture usage, and by the whole context which describes the case; by the position of the parties in this early controversy; and by the previous positive decision of Christ in his Sermon on the Mount. I have also shown, that if the Decalogue were to be included in the term, as here used, it would follow by necessity from his own statement, that there remains no moral obligation on Gentile Christians except to abstain from idolatry and fornication, which is as absurd in morals as it is contrary to the whole tenor of the New Testament. So much for his arguments.

In vain will "Exodus" seek to sustain his shattered position by saying that under his "second proposition" he has proved the Sabbath to be "strictly ceremonial and Jewish." That proposition has been, (I trust to the conviction of all,) completely shattered before. No point, therefore, remains on which he can fall back and rally his shattered forces, unless it be on the subsequent facts. But these will not help him. The churches of the Gentiles "rejoiced for the consolation" of the Apostolic decree, on better grounds than that of freedom from the Decalogue; for (as I proved in Part I. of my reply,) they did "keep the Sabbath on the Lord's Day." My friend seems to have been misled by a recollection of Pliny's Epistle to Trajan, as to their early morning meetings in a time of severe persecution. But neither the Pagan Pliny, nor any Christian writer that I remember, will bear him out in his assertion that they spent the rest of the Lord's Day, even then, in their ordinary work.

Sure I am, as I shall now show clearly, that these early Christian writers speak a very different language. "God hath required us," says Clement of Rome, (A. D. 95,) "to serve Him in the appointed times and seasons." "On the day that is called Sunday," says Justin Martyr, (A. D. 140,) "all, both of the country and city, assemble together; when we preach and pray, and discharge all the other usual parts of divine worship." "On Sunday we give ourselves to joy," says Tertullian, (A. D. 200.) "We keep the eighth day," says Barnabas, (still earlier,) meaning the day after the Jewish Sabbath, "with gladness." "To-day being the Lord's day," says Dionysius of Corinth, (A. D. 165,) "we keep it holy." And Clement of Alexandria still more explicitly says, that "a true Christian, according to the commands of the Gospel, observes the Lord's day, by casting out all evil thoughts, and entertaining all good ones, glorifying the resurrection of the Lord on that day." And so far from regarding it as "burdensome," he calls it "the chief of days, our rest indeed." In fact, the only thing "burdensome" about it, would be to quote all their various expressions of devout recognition of the Christian Sabbath.

What, then, in view of these authentic facts, becomes of my friend's assertion to the contrary? or of his confident conclusion, that "the abrogation of the Sabbath by the Council at Jerusalem, is as certain and distinct as [illegible]f circumcision?" I am curious enoug[illegible]h to see whether he can produce s[illegible]vidence as the above, "equally certain and distinct," that the primitive Gentile Christians observed "circumcision," or indeed any part of the "burdensome" Jewish ritual. His eloquent parallel between them is, alas for him! untrue in every particular—"vox, et praeterea nihil." Nor can Bishop Warburton help "Exodus" here, however willing. John Bunyan would not, if he could; for he really is on my ground, as any one may see who reads him with proper attention.

I have now done with the fifth proposition of my eloquent friend. God grant that he may have done with it too! I reserve the examination of the sixth, to the next week, for fear of crowding your columns. J. N. B.

CONFESSION OF A CONVERT.

I had been preaching the grand doctrines of repentance towards God, and faith in Jesus Christ; and, turning to the people, asked, "Does any one of you weep for his sins?" A young man said, "I weep for my sins; my tears are not outward, but inward; my soul weeps for sin." Astonished at such language from one whom I had never observed, I asked, "Do you know how your sins are to be removed?" He said, "Jesus bore our burdens on his own head, and gave his life a sacrifice for sin." On further questioning him as to how such convictions rose in his mind, he said, "After hearing you preach, as I was walking in the fields, the thought came into my mind, 'What will become of me after death?' I saw that I had been a sinner from my birth, and had forgotten my true Father." "Are you ready," I still further asked, "to confess Christ before men?" "Yes." "Are you not afraid of the world's opposition?" "What can the world do, if my Creator protects me?" He said to himself, without apparent sense of any one's presence, "I am a great sinner; all my life has been spent in sin. Thou art my Lord. Cast away all my sins! Give me light!" Reader, this young man, convinced of his own sin, and of the righteousness of Christ, had never heard the gospel, save on two previous occasions in my tent. He was baptized and has been a consistent Christian till the present day. [Clarkson.

DON'T FRET.—It is unamiable. A fretting man or woman is one of the most unlovely objects in the world. A wasp is a comfortable housemate in comparison—it only stings when disturbed. But an habitual fretter buzzes, if he don't sting, with or without provocation. "It is better to dwell in the corner of a house-top, than with a brawling woman and in a wide house."

It is useless. It sets no broken bones, stops no leaks, gathers no spilt milk, cements no smashed pitchers, cures no spoiled hay, and changes no east winds. It affects nobody but the fretter himself. Children or servants cease to respect the authority or obey the commands of a complaining, worrisome, exacting parent or master. They know that "barking dogs don't bite," and fretters don't strike; and they conduct themselves accordingly.

MY FATHER.

My father raised his trembling hand,
And laid it on my head:
"God bless thee, O my son, my son,"
Most tenderly he said.

He died, and left no gems or gold,
But still I was his heir—
For that rich blessing which he gave
Became a fortune rare.

Still, in my weary hours of toil
To earn my daily bread,
It gladdens me in thought to feel
His hand upon my head.

Though infant tongues to me have said,
"Dear father!" oft since then,
Yet when I bring that scene to mind,
I'm but a child again.

STRONGHOLD OF ENGLISH BAPTISTS.

To English Nonconformity, Northampton is, or ought to be, a sort of Mecca. Three hundred years ago, it gave birth to Robert Brown, the father of English congregationalism; and within the last generations Northampton and its neighborhood have been a chief stronghold of the English Baptists. It was here that the Rylands ministered; the elder, in his orthodox vehemence a Boanerges, in his tender feelings a beloved disciple; the younger, famous for his microscopic eyes, and who ought to have been famous for his telescopic heart; for never was there spirit more catholic, or one who could espy goodness at a greater distance. It was in the adjacent Kettering that Andrew Fuller labored for thirty years; in a noisy study (for it was withal a populous nursery) composing those volumes which have gone so far to give the right tone and attempering to modern Calvinism; a deep digger in the Bible mine, and whose rich, though clumsy ingots, supply to the present day the mint of many a sermon-coiner; himself too homely to be a popular preacher, and too unambitious to regret it, he was in contrivance resourceful, and in council sagacious; the mainspring of each denominational movement, and one of the purest philanthropists, but blunt and ungainly withal. And in Northampton and its surrounding villages a poor cobbler used to ply his craft—for Northampton is the Selkirk of the South—its citizens are sutors; and leaving at home his broken-hearted wife, poor cobbler Carey would hawk from door to door his shoes of supererogation to pay the funeral charges of his child. Under ague and rain, and the unsaleable sackful, he was revolving that Eastern mission of which he was soon to be the father and founder, and from borrowed grammars acquiring those elements of Polyglottal power, which shortly developed in him a Briareus of Oriental Translation. DREADFUL MISTAKE.

It would be nothing strange, should it be found, in the great day of trial, that this age was distinguished as an age of self-deception; and if we take not great heed to ourselves, we shall glide on with the same general current. And it is the saddest, most dreadful mistake that ever man fell into, to dream on of heaven, only to awake and find himself in hell. We had better do any thing most hard, be pressed with the greatest evils, encompassed with the most painful difficulties, endure all labors, undergo all suffering, practice every self-denial of the good soldier of Jesus Christ, than remain in such danger. What is it not worth to be unalterably safe in Christ, to have constant experience of his preciousness, to be making constant additions to our knowledge of him, to be nourished daily by his grace, and to be animated constantly by his love? O, if we had any thing in this world of a value in the least to be compared with the blessedness of a well-grounded hope in Christ, we would not leave it for a single day in such risk as we do our hope of heaven, by living at such a distance from our Saviour.

What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue! absorbed with vanities! a vision made for eternity, blinded by the shadows of time. A soul made for God and the boundless realities of everlasting ages, absorbed with earth, and the poor worthless trifles of transitory years! Is this the manner in which Christ would have his pupils live! Or is the prize of heaven's eternal inheritance of so little concern? Ah, no! the crown of righteousness is not so little worth. [Cheever.

THE SWEARER AND HIS BOY.

A man in the State of New York, who was extremely addicted to profane swearing, was one day at work with a yoke of oxen near his house. The oxen not working to suit him, he began whipping them severely, at the same time uttering volleys of most horridly blasphemous oaths. The oxen breaking loose from their burthen, ran to the house, while the owner in a passion pursued them, and coming up with them at the house, began whipping them again, and swearing horridly as before. His little boy, at this time just old enough to begin to talk, began to prattle his profane oaths after him. No sooner did the father hear this, than his feelings were wrought up to a lively sensibility. He paused for a moment, dropt his whip, sat down and wept bitterly. A flood of keen reflections at once rushed upon his convicted conscience, which produced such an effect that he found no rest to his mind, day or night, until his sins were forgiven.

THE STRAY LAMB RECOVERED.—As one of the early Wesleyan ministers was riding by a farm-house, he saw a young woman whom he knew to be a backslider. Driving to the door, and fixing a look of sympathy upon her, he asked her if she had seen a stray lamb pass. She replied that she had not. "Are you quite sure," said he, "that there has been no poor lost lamb here?" "I am quite sure," she replied. "And yet," continued he, "there has been one here." The true meaning of the minister suddenly broke upon her mind. She burst into tears, confessed that she was the stray lamb, and promised to renew her devotion to her Shepherd. She afterwards became a devout Christian.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

Upon the article of "J. N. B.," which is given on our first page, we have but few remarks to offer. For the most part the arguments are sound—just such arguments as would come with a very good grace from a Seventh-day Baptist, though they appear marvelously inconsistent in the mouth of a Sunday-keeper. His quotations from Ecclesiastical History are about as much to the point as those of Pedobaptists are in support of infant baptism, and about as reliable.

He quotes Clement, bishop of Rome, covertly insinuating that he is one of the early fathers who held to the observance of the Sunday. We never read Clement's Epistle, but if we can take the testimony of those who have—men who certainly had an interest in making it say something in favor of the popular practice—there is not one word of allusion in it to the religious observance of the first day of the week. Why did not "J. N. B." quote a passage from it that was a little more explicit than the one he has quoted? Evidently, because he could not. Had he been able to do so, it would have helped his cause more than the testimony of all the other fathers put together. The time when the Epistle was written is not certain. "J. N. B." appears to adopt the opinion of Lardner; though Archbishop Wake and others contend that it was written as early as some year between 64 and 70. It is passing strange, however, if the "Lord's Day" was then observed by the Church, that Clement should be so perfectly silent about it. A testimony clear and explicit to its observance at so early a date, would be of great weight in the controversy; while the absence of it constitutes a strong presumption that such an observance was not known. For the benefit of our readers we will give a full quotation of the passage from which "J. N. B." has made his extract:—

> Seeing, then, those things are manifest unto us, it will behove us to take care that, looking into the depths of the divine knowledge, we do all things in order whatsoever our Lord has commanded us to do, and particularly that we perform our offerings and service to God at their appointed seasons, for those he has commanded to be done, not rashly and disorderly, but at certain determinate times and hours; and therefore he has ordained by his supreme will and authority, both where and by what persons they are to be performed; that so all things being piously done unto all well pleasing, they may be acceptable unto him. They, therefore, who make their offerings at the appointed seasons, are happy and accepted; because that, obeying the commandments of the Lord, they are free from sin. And the same care must be had of the persons that minister unto him. For the chief priest has his proper services, and to the priests their proper place is appointed, and to the Levites appertain their proper ministries, and the layman is confined within the bounds of what is commanded to laymen. Let every one of you, therefore, brethren, bless God in his proper station, with a good conscience, and with all gravity, not exceeding the rule of his service that is appointed to him. The daily sacrifices are not offered everywhere, nor the peace-offerings, nor the sacrifices appointed for sins and transgressions, but only at Jerusalem, nor in any place there, but only at the altar before the temple.—[Ch. 40 and 41—Archbishop Wake's Translation.

There, reader, if there is in all this passage a single word which can be fairly construed into a recognition of the so-called Lord's day, we are quite unable to discover it. It is clear that Clement is here speaking of the rites and sacrifices appointed by the Mosaic law. But whether, because he speaks in the present tense, he is to be regarded as implying that they were still in use in his time, is perhaps questionable. Be that as it may, it is very singular that he did not impress upon those to whom he was writing the indispensable obligation they were under to observe the new Christian rite of Sunday worship, had this rite then existed. "It will behove us," says he, "to do all things in order whatsoever our Lord has commanded us to do, and particularly that we perform our offerings and service to God at their appointed seasons." But he never hints that Sunday is one of those appointed seasons. On the contrary, he speaks as if the only authorized seasons of worship were those which had been appointed in the law. In fact, he talks more like a Judaizer than Seventh-day Baptists ever did, notwithstanding "they, wittingly, or unwittingly, uphold the authority of the whole abrogated Jewish ritual, and deny the authority of Christ as Head over all." "J. N. B." is surely driven into close quarters when he grasps at such testimony.

The extract from Justin Martyr may pass for what it is worth. That such services were attended to in Justin's time, and that too on "the day that is called Sunday," is not denied. But it cannot be determined from this testimony that he intended any thing more than that such services were attended to on the Sunday in which the Church of Rome, a short time after this, is known to have closed the paschal feast, which was observed annually. Nor is his testimony any more explicit in regard to the extent of the practice. For though he says, "this was done by those in the city and in the country," it is not certain that he intended any thing more than the city of Rome and its suburbs. Still less does the testimony of Justin make any thing for observing the first day of the week as a Sabbath. On that point he spoils the whole business for our Sunday people; becauee he adds, "and after certain religious devotions, all returned home to their labors." (See Heylin's History of the Sabbath, part 2d.) This part of Justin's testimony "J. N. B." has prudently omitted.

The quotation from Barnabas is entitled to no credit. There is every reason to conclude that the epistle which goes under his name is a forgery. It is so considered by all ecclesiastical historians of any note, and Eusebius declares it to be a spurious production, entitled to no confidence. But what does the extract given by "J. N. B." prove, at any rate? Any one who can see in it a proof of the transfer of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, will not be puzzled to find proof for any thing that he wishes to be true. The truth of the matter—if the authorities we have consulted are to be depended on—stands thus: Barnabas, or whoever it was that wrote the epistle, had expatiated at some length, in that mystical style which was peculiar to the ancient fathers, about the millennium. He had found, to his own satisfaction at least, that as God made the world in six days and rested the seventh, so in six thousand years the Lord will bring all things to an end.

"Therefore, children, in six days, that is, in six thousand years, shall all things be accomplished. And what is that he saith, And he rested the seventh day? He meaneth this, that when his Son shall come and abolish the season of the wicked one, and judge the ungodly, and shall change the sun, and the moon, and the stars, then he shall gloriously rest in that seventh day. . . . Lastly, he saith unto them, Your new moons and your Sabbaths, I cannot bear them. Consider what he means by it. The Sabbaths, says he, which you now keep, are not acceptable unto me; but those which I have made, when resting from all things. I shall begin the eighth day, that is, the beginning of the other world; for which cause we observe the eighth day with gladness, on which also Jesus rose from the dead."

Here it will be observed, that though the resurrection of Christ is alluded to, it is not as a reason for observing the first day of the week, but merely as a coincidence. The true reason for observing the day was to do honor to the eighth day of the other world! Can it be possible that "J. N. B." feels himself aided by such testimony?

That what is commonly called the "Lord's Day," began to be observed weekly at a very early period, we have no disposition to deny. "J. N. B." may continue to multiply his proofs of this ad infinitum, but what does it all avail? The particular point which he wishes to prove is, that the day was regarded as a Sabbath, or, to use his own phrase, that "the Sabbath was observed on the Lord's Day." It is impossible for him to do it by any testimony of a reliable character. On this point "Exodus" has the advantage most decidedly. That the ancient Sabbath—the seventh day of the week—was quite extensively observed, even by those who paid a regard to the Sunday as a festival, both of the disputants seem to be aware; and the weight of this fact is not to be destroyed by the round assertion [illegible] the observers of it were Judaizers, [illegible] begging the very question in dispute.

GLIMPSES OF DOMESTIC LIFE IN CHINA—No. 9.

SHANGHAE, October, 1850.

You have doubtless expected ere this a fuller description of those scenes which you have been accustomed to consider as purely domestic. Perhaps you have drawn your pictures of Chinese houses from the general characteristics of civilized life as delineated in all other parts of the world, and have forgotten the fact that "every thing is reversed in China." If, when you asked for their "kitchens, their sitting-rooms, and their dormitories," you meant by those terms such apartments as are known by the same names at home, you were quite unwarrantably comparing them with yourselves, and measuring them by a standard which proves that you were not, for that little once, too wise to be deceived. But you shall hear.

The Chinese fireside is the most uninteresting place to which I could well take you, unless, Gipsey-like, you should fancy an encampment in the open fields, beside their frequent bonfires for the dead. Here you would behold their grandest illuminations. The burning heaps of ghostly bullion, accompanied by gilt paper in various other forms, as of copper cash, or in long strips or square pieces, their only coin current between this world and the invisible—the conflagration of mimic palaces, composed of the frailest possible materials, but of most delicate fancy work in color and finish, with such accompaniments as affection or love of ostentation may suggest—out-houses for servants, ponies for the pleasure-grounds of paradise, sedan chairs for more quiet excursions, and robes of state for great occasions—send out a momentary gleam upon the surrounding darkness, brilliant as it is evanescent. For one brief moment only, fancy might riot at will amid the glare of the ascending gifts, but for the overwhelming wail of the "mourning women," which greets in one long funereal cry the unwilling ear, and the "sight of the eye," as it beholds the kneelings and prostrations at your side, "affects too deeply your heart" to allow one thought for aught but the degradations of heathenism.

Wearied with this mockery, you will perhaps be prepared to look, with a feeling very like the mournful gratitude of the philanthropist, upon the more disgusting but far more welcome rite of burning the garments of the deceased. You see the straw mat on which he died, the garments he last used, with such additions as are thought proper, the whole nicely adjusted, and covered with the blue counterpane; and, well aware, as you have become, that it is only designed as an offering to the dead, still you are prepared, from all you have learned of the filthy habits of the Chinese, to be thankful for any "abatement of the nuisance," and you bless the superstition which "from seeming evil thus educes good." Here again the kneelings and prostrations, as the mourners come out of the house in the order of their relationship, to pay their homage at the burning pile, is the one draw-back in a scene which would otherwise inspire only such emotions as David might have felt at the thresing floor of Araunah the Jebusite.

With similar emotions you may pause at the shrine of some wayside god, to inhale the grateful incense, which, powerless though it may be to propitiate his godship, does much to reconcile you to the otherwise heart-saddening features in all these "vain oblations." You almost feel for the moment that the saying so much used in the land of Sinim—"that the first work of a foreigner, on coming to China, should be to get rid of his nose"—is not so very appropriate after all. As sure as effect follows cause, as certainly as the destroying angel may be appeased by the perfumes from the golden censor, so truly shall the noisome vapors which burden heaven's free air be neutralized by the healthful odors which thus antagonize with their pestiferous breath. The natives themselves, though probably not aware of the disinfecting agency of these perfumes, wear them constantly as charms about their persons. Some times, as strings of beads, they are thrown about the neck, or suspended from the button that fastens the garments over the right breast, whence also are often seen hanging, in costly profusion, more fantastically formed amulets, for the same purpose, and are used as a sovereign panacea against the wayside nuisances which every where abound. Other charms, for other evils, are considered equally important, but will be better described in their more appropriate places.

We are not yet done with fireside scenery. That ominous "click-click" of the bamboo, which you hear in the distance, announces the approach of a veritable kitchen; and while you turn to gaze, the complaisant steward has already withdrawn his shoulder from the pole on which is suspended the smoking, boiling, steaming burden, which is now left to occupy a notable place in the middle of the six or eight feet wide street. The glowing fire, bubbling broth, and steaming rice, soon become the center of attraction to the hungry multitudes, whom necessity or fancy impel forward, or whose latent impulses lead them instinctively to gather around this focal point of social life. The repast ended, the traveling hotel again sets forward, to become again the center of another hungry group.

And now we pass on, to be perhaps at the next turn saluted with the fumes of the omnipresent bean oil, and almost stumble upon the fire-place whereon is deposited the "boiling caldron" which contains it, tossing upon its billowy surface the sponge-like cakes, and vieing with its neighbor of the hot-water school, whose business it is to boil their little meat pies, after the most approved style of Chinese epicureanism.

You may well be startled at your fearful proximity to fire and oil; but be careful, in shunning this Scylla on your right, that you avoid also Charybdis on your left; for there, in the form of an oven, open at the top, and heated from beneath, you behold the furnace seven times hotter than you care to find it. But just look in, and you will see that along the concave sides of that hollow oven are fastened hosts of little cakes, in the process of being baked; but by what means they contrive to cling to the arch, even to its very keystone, is a mystery I have never yet been able to solve.

A little farther on, surrounded by a curious group, some of them "children of a larger growth," you will see the candy man, at his migratory fireside, quietly toiling over his vessel of melted sugar, drawing out its liquid contents, and blowing and pressing them as they cool into the most ingenious forms of plants, animals, and men, as glass-blowers do their balls and bottles, but with a dexterity and ease which nothing of the kind I have ever seen could excel, if indeed it could equal. Nor are these the only firesides which promenade our streets, but the detail would weary you, and I forbear.

We will not, however, pass by the busy smith, whose machinery, unlike as it is to every thing you have seen of the kind, from its very strangeness reminds you of home, as opposites are said ever to suggest each other; and you feel a kind of proud pleasure in stopping a moment before his open shop. The clumsy bellows is worked by a hand moving horizontally, as if at a "game of push and pull," the bellows itself being constructed on the principle of the air-pump. Right merrily does the crater-like forge display its Ætna fires, and you instinctively start back as you see the red lava line drawn forth by Vulcan and laid upon the waiting anvil. Perhaps he is forging an anchor, perhaps a gun-barrel; neither is much of a novelty to you; but when you see the brawny arms of his five hopeful sons, plying with their five huge sledges as many successive blows upon the same small brilliant spot of steel, you conclude that the organs of time and order must be well developed, upon the craniums of some of the Chinese at least.

But, not to keep you longer in the street, we will enter the first house you choose—it will serve as a sample for the whole. It is only to pass an entrance hall or two, and you find yourself in the one grand kitchen of the united household. It seems a very limited affair, but it is nevertheless broader than many of the streets beside which cooking is conducted on even a larger scale than is required here. Against the wall is built a fire-range, of the height of a common table, sometimes in a semi-circular form, and sometimes narrow at its first extremity, but gradually widening until it meets the contiguous wall. Shallow kettles, of graduated sizes, are fitted at intervals along its surface into the brick and mortar work, each over its appropriate arch, the arch itself being furnished with a grate very near the kettle, which leaves a large space to receive the falling embers beneath. These all communicate by a common tunnel with the chimney at the end, and the whole affair constitutes a most ingenious as well as economical contrivance, the fires being required for cooking only, and not designed to be used in warming the dwellings. The simple fire-place here described, with its kettles, and their slight wooden lids, want only a tea-kettle to make the complement. A basket for washing rice, and a basin and towel for the face, a small brush made after the manner of the aboriginal birch brooms of my native land, (the truly efficient agent in the washing of pots and pans,) a vessel in which the cups, bowls and chop-sticks are rinsed, with or without a towel for drying them, a shelf or table for the bowls, and a narrow deep basket for the chop-sticks, a brass ladle, and a few porcelain spoons, a stool for the cook, and a small extra furnace for his tea-kettle, with a warm, cushion-like basket of the leaves of the bamboo, made to fit his tea-pot, as an almond shell covers it kernel, thus economically confining the heat, which it is made to retain for a long time—and you have the Chinese kitchen, with all the indispensables thereunto belonging. And yet not all; for Chau Kuen, the household god, (a mere picture by the way,) must have his niche in the wall, perform his office as seer of the domestic world, and be ready at the close of the year to render up his account in person to his superiors, being annually dispatched through the ever ready chariot of fire to their abode, whence, after a short absence, he returns in a new body, with renewed honors, to resume anew the duties incident to his important post.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 8.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN, of New York.

Set sail from San Juan—Character of the Captain and Mate—The Corn Islands—Musqueto Keys—Arrive at the Island of St. Andrews—Description of the Island—An American Missionary—A Gale—Lose our Anchor—Narrow Escape from Wreck—Put to sea, and leave the Captain on shore.

The brig had been anchored in fresh water, but before we had gone a mile we were pitching in the swell of the Caribbean Sea. That day the wind was off the land, and in a few hours after our anchor was up, we were out of sight of the low coast, and escaped from the myriads of small musquitoes that infect it. We thought it a luxury to be once more on the open sea; and though we were crowded in the cabin, and the vessel was the most wretchedly fitted up of any that I ever saw, yet it was so refreshing to stretch our limbs out in a berth, with a pillow under our heads, and the prospect of a short voyage of only ten days to the soil of our own native land, that we were all in the best of spirits.

Capt. Lawrence was a good-natured fellow; though illiterate, and passionate when roused, yet he had not under other circumstances energy or decision enough to govern his vessel. The Mate, Mr. Suttor, was on the contrary all decision and energy, without judgment, or a tolerable share of sense. Vain-glorious and boisterous, his voice could be heard in every body's mess, and the command of the vessel to all purposes soon fell to him. Abusive and tyrannical to those he did not fear, he was at the same time obsequious to those who, he thought, had the power to injure or benefit him. He was on his way from California, as he told me soon after we sailed, was at Chagres when the Mechanic was fitting out, and was offered the place of Mate. He also informed me that the brig had been wrecked at that place, was condemned, bought for a small consideration by several gamblers, and sent up to San Juan for passengers as a place where the character of the vessel would not be so well known. He further stated, that it was the intention of the Captain to wreck the brig Union, and that he as mate expected to realize a fine sum from salvage. He was very communicative, and there were but few who did not have an opportunity to know the history of his whole life, as well as that of his family and his native town; and some of the passengers would gratify his vanity for the sake of seeing the wonderful inflation it produced, just as boys will tease the sea-porcupine with a straw to see the fish bloat.

The land breeze failed, and then followed a calm; after that the usual N. E. Trades, and we were compelled to stand off south-east. The brig had been sent out without spare rigging or a spare sail, and as we were here liable to light showers, attended with more or less increase of wind, the top-gallant sails were taken in every two or three hours, to prevent their being injured. The voice of Mr. Suttor would wake every one on board several times in the night, by bawling to the men, to "stand by the fore to'gallant balliards!" till, from its frequency and long continuance, it finally ceased to be noticed. We were beating about for ten days, endeavoring to get to windward, in order to lay our course clear of Cape Gratias a Dios. The Corn Islands were in sight four days, a fine trade wind blowing all the time, yet the Captain still persisted in beating up to the northward, against a one-knot current. At length the wind hawled more to the eastward, and we ran north until we made a group of keys and reefs between latitude 14° and 15° N. and longitude 82° and 83°. We sounded, and found eleven fathoms of water, when we stood S. E. by S. It began now to appear, that our vessel was inadequately supplied with provisions. Some important articles were already exhausted. We were also without proper medicines. Several cases of fever made their appearance, and no quinine was on board, except such as was in the hands of passengers, and even that was nearly gone.

On the 2d of January, in the morning, we made the island of St. Andrews, and endeavored to beat up to it for the remainder of that day, and during the following night we stood N. W. by W. till two o'clock A. M., when we tacked and made the west side about 8 A. M. There seemed to be no information on board relative to this island, but the Captain expressed an anxiety to get water and fresh provisions if possible. We were now only about one hundred and fifty miles from our point of departure, and at this rate it was evident that we should fall short of stores of every description. We came so near the island that we saw neat cottages on the highest parts, and satisfied ourselves that it was inhabited; but by what race, or what language was spoken, we knew not. St. Andrews lies in lat. 12° 33′ N. and long. 81° 43′. It is about seven miles long, and three broad. The west side is abrupt, three or four hundred feet high, and gradually sloping to the eastward. We continued to stand in until the cocoa-nut and plantain trees were distinguishable; at the same time the surf which dashed upon its shores seemed to preclude all hope of a landing; but, to our great relief, just as we were preparing to go about, a canoe was seen coming out to us. The brig was hove to, and two negroes came alongside in a craft that looked more like a hog-trough than a boat. It was about ten feet long, two wide, and had large holes in the sides, were the wood had rotted away. It required the constant bailing of one to keep it clear, and here they were, off soundings, and on the open sea. The negroes were taken on board, and the canoe hoisted in after them. They informed us that they could take us to good anchorage, and that provisions were plenty. We let go our anchor in five fathoms of water, with white coral bottom, and about a quarter of a mile from shore, opposite to a small cove. The boats were got out, and a considerable party of us were soon on shore. There was no one at the landing, and we followed the path that presented through the forest of lancewood, wild limes, guavas, a species of fig-tree resembling the banyan of the East, and other trees common to the West Indies, but unknown to me, for a mile or more, to the summit of the hill. Here was a neat cottage, occupied by an Englishman who had resided on the island for twenty years. He told us that Mr. Livingston, a missionary of the Laight-st. Baptist Church, and himself, were the only white persons on the island; the population, four or five hundred in number, being negroes of all the various shades. Many of them are from Jamaica, and they talk the English with variations peculiar to themselves. I could not recognize it at first as having any resemblance to our native tongue. The vowel sounds were distended to their fullest capacity of breadth and length, and the prevailing enunciation was in the minor key. Not knowing how short our stay might be, I sought to improve the time and explore the island as far as possible, following whatever road I found. The native huts are like those of Central America, except that the side walls are of bamboo, split into staves, and interlaced like basket work. The people are very destitute of all the comforts of civilization, and subsist for the most part on the spontaneons productions of the soil. They are just emerging from a state of slavery, in which blacks themselves of the most depraved character are the slave-holders. Cotton is the only article of consequence that is cultivated for export, requiring slave labor; but I was informed that the apprentice system is gradually emancipating the island. It is nominally under the government of New Grenada. The arrival of a vessel is a circumstance so rare, that the people were thrown into a state of excitement such as the island had not witnessed for years. Every where, as we passed along the way, people were making preparations to trade. Oranges, limes, soursops, papaws, and cocoa-nuts, were being gathered for the morrow. We had gone several miles by the winding road, and, desirous of reaching the windward side of the island, in the hope of finding some shells, we stopped at a cottage to inquire the road that would lead us to it. Every thing was neatly arranged about the well-furnished room, and four or five young white women were seated around it, dressed in American fashion, and sitting up as prim and solemn as school-girls expecting visitors. My first impression was that there was a death in the family, and they were awaiting the funeral ceremonies. The scene was so unexpected, that I was completely abashed, and was upon the point of retreating. They were evidently prepared, and I finally summoned up courage to inquire the way to the beach. They made some answer, but whether they understood me or not I could not tell. It was certain that I could not recognize the English in their vernacular, and went on to another house, where we had better success, and obtained the services of a lad as guide. We passed several cultivated fields, and saw yams, cassavi, cotton, corn, and cane, growing finely, while cocoa-nuts, guavas, tamarinds, and limes, grew wild in great quantities. There is no market for them, and they are suffered to perish where they grow. The sweet potatoes were pronounced as good as grow in any part of the world. The papaws are smaller and sweeter than those of Central America, where they grow larger than the largest muskmelons.

After spending two or three hours along the beach, looking for shells and coral, we went to a hut of the natives for food. Several dishes were prepared, but fried eggs and plantains were all that we could reconcile to our not over-fastidious appetites. Coffee was prepared by one of the company, but doubts being entertained about their being able to render it palatable, objection was made. Our hostess thought it was because we were unwilling to incur the expense, and wondered at it, considering that we were just from California! Before we had concluded our repast, we were surrounded by nearly all the women in the neighborhood, in their best attire. Two girls, quadroons, evidently regarded by their darker companions as capable of making an impression, were orphans left in possession of a considerable quantity of land, with tenants, slaves, and how many cocoa-nut trees I do not remember. Even here on this little Caribbean Isle, land monopoly is in full force. Land is valued at about two dollars an acre, and there is no part of it that is not susceptible of high cultivation. Cocoa-nut trees are valued at seven dollars each, and a thrifty tree will produce several hundred cocoa-nuts in one year. We returned to the harbor by another road, carrying our clothes full of limes and guavas, and our hands full of green soursops, which grew wild; but by the time we reached our vessel's deck, the guavas were made into a jelly, and I looked as though I had narrowly escaped from a cider press.

The island is protected from the the sea, on the windward side, by a coral reef, extending half way around it, and about a mile distant; but the opposite side is bold, having five fathoms close up to the coral rock, which is undermined by the waves, and honey-combed. The whole island is comparatively a wilderness, and covered with forests, which, when seen from the sea, gives it a charming appearance. Coral rock is the only kind we saw. Until very recently, the population was in the most abject vice and ignorance, but the efforts of Mr. Livingston have been productive of great benefit to them. I asked our guide the length of the island. He replied that it was long enough; but being pressed to give his idea of it in miles, he said about seven hundred!

The following night, the wind hauled to the northward, and a heavy sea set into our anchorage, which caused us to roll badly. The next morning the wind had increased, and the natives, who had congregated around the landing with their produce, were unable to get it on board. A canoe, in attempting to come off with a load of fruit, was swamped with four persons, and the natives on shore dared not venture to their assistance in their small canoes. They called loudly for help, but the mate said he had no boat for the "d—d niggers," and went about his business with as little concern as though the accident had not happened. The captain, however, after some time, went himself with the jolly-boat, picked them up and carried them to the shore. The long-boat was used during the day in bringing on board hogs and fruit. As the prospect for the passengers' stores was getting bad, two of us obtained permission of the mate to take the jolly-boat and go on shore. We returned with a load of oranges, cocoa-nuts, &c., for the cabin passengers, and succeeded in getting them on board safely. At night the wind increased to a gale, many trees were torn up, but we rode in safety, being under the lee of the island, though the rolling was so violent that fears were entertained for our masts, as the rigging was not set up well.

In the morning, as our roadstead was becoming untenable, it was decided to proceed on our voyage. The anchor was hove short, the fore topsail loosed, and the boats lashed on deck, when signals were made to us from the shore. These were at length so earnest as to lead to the impression that intelligence had arrived from the wreck at Serrana. A boat was lowered, and our Captain, with Captain Hutchinson, and three men, pulled off for the shore. Scarcely had they entered the cove, when the heave of the sea, with the wind on our loosed topsail, parted our anchor close to the stock. Immediately it was discovered that we were drifting rapidly upon the coral rocks. The mate, finding himself suddenly in command, and no one to depend upon for direction, lost his self-possession, and instead of making sail to get out of the peril, ran forward to unlash the other anchor, which was as fast as it had been during the voyage. Before this could have been effected, we should have been beyond saving. We were already but a few lengths from the rocks, upon which the sea was dashing fearfully, and every moment the distance grew shorter. To me it seemed inevitable that we must strike, and I hurried down into the cabin for all that was left to me of a pair of boots, to enable me to leap upon the rocks the moment she should strike, and before the vessel should recoil. Capt. Titcomb was below, but fortunately Capt. C. C. Sisson, of Mystic, who was of our party, and an admirable seaman, seeing the mate beside himself, with perfect equanimity took the helm, and deeming the occasion one that did not admit of ceremony, told the mate to hoist the jibs, and haul out the topsail. He did so immediately, and as the head sails filled, command of the vessel was once more obtained. As soon as the mate got an insight of what was necessary to do, he ran back to the quarter-deck, pale and agitated, and said, "Keep cool, men, I am here myself"—which, taken in connection with the scenes passing around, was awfully ridiculous. It was impossible to lay to in our present situation, as it was as much as the brig could do to hold her own in such a sea with all the sail that she could carry; and we stood off on the wind under reefed topsail and mainsail. The boat, as she approached the landing, was accosted by two or three negros, informing the Captain that they had some cocoa-nuts there that they would be glad to dispose of before he left! They turned about with the indignation that could be conceived; but what was their astonishment to see the brig, with sails set, flying directly from them! They followed us as far as they dared, then returned, and having climbed a large fig-tree on the highest part of the island, watched the receding sail until it was but a speck on the horizon. They then went to the Englishman's house, to speculate on the strange and unaccountable proceeding. Was the mate false to them, or had the passengers mutinied, put him in confinement, and proceeded on their voyage direct to New Orleans?

THE OPIUM TRADE IN CHINA.—A letter from Mr. Tallmage, of Amoy, dated Dec. 17, says that foreign merchants are engaged more or less directly in the opium trade, which is "entailing a fearful curse on the land, and yearly increasing the number of its victims. A reproach is thereby cast upon the Christian religion, and missionary effort greatly impeded."

Scriptural Benevolence.—The American Tract Society is circulating several treatises on benevolence, in which is illustrated and enforced the Scripture doctrine, that every one should contribute for benevolent purposes, and that statedly and as God hath prospered. The following pledge, which has been adopted by many pastors and laymen, should be adopted by all—only we would have the laying by done, not on the Sabbath, but, according to Scripture, "on the first day of the week," immediately after the Sabbath, while the heart is yet warm with its holy influences:—

"Believing that the Scripture system of benevolence requires every one statedly to 'lay by him in store as God hath prospered him,' I engage, on every Sabbath, or at other stated periods, to set apart such a portion of what God shall give me, as my judgment and conscience shall dictate, to be sacredly applied to charitable objec,ts according to my sense of their respective claims."

Perversions to Rome.—The perversions to the Romish Church, as the London Times calls them, continue. Among the more recent, two of some importance are mentioned—sufficiently important to inspire a leader in one of the morning journals. We find the following account of them:

In addition to the batch of Tractarians who went over en masse to the Church of Rome, in Leeds, on Thursday last, we have now to announce the names of Archdeacon Manning, and of Mr. James R. Hope, Queen's Counsel, as having also embraced Popery. Archdeacon Manning is brother to the Bishop of Oxford, another of whose near relations may be confidently expected to join the Romish communion in a few days. It is expected that the Archdeacon will bring over with him to Rome a considerable number of persons, some of them of high rank. He was the most influential man among the Tractarians, and has already sent various recruits to Rome.

Education in China.—A letter from a minister at Amoy, China, states that a very interesting experiment is being made, by which it is hoped the obstacles to education in China may be diminished. It has been ascertained that by the use of seventeen letters of the Roman alphabet, every consonant and vowel found in the Amoy language may be expressed, and all the tones may be designated by a few additional marks. Dr. Young has commenced teaching the colloquial language, as written with the Roman alphabet, in his school, and arrangements have been made to print a volume in the same language. Dr. Y. is of the opinion that boys apt in acquiring knowledge, may be prepared for reading the Scriptures by the new method in less than three months.

Mahommedans Defending Christians.—It is stated in a foreign paper, that when a Turkish mob at Aleppo made an attack upon the Christians at that place, who are few in number, and without means of defense, and killed five of them, wounding six more, and pillaging one hundred houses and five churches, the Sultan came to their rescue with his guards, and shot six hundred of the mob, condemned three hundred to the galleys, and put one hundred and fifty more on their trial. He has restored all the property he could recover to the Christians to whom it belonged, and recompensed the rest of the sufferers out of his own purse.

Fire in Independence, N.Y.—On the night of the 13th April, the dwelling of Lewis Fish, in the town of Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., was burned. The family were not awakened until the flames had proceeded so far that they could not safely contemplate anything farther than an escape in the condition in which they sprang from their beds. The family consisted of the parents and eleven children. On taking observation, after having escaped, they were shocked to find that one of the children, a boy about ten years old, was missing. But the prospect of a rescue was hopeless, and the survivors were forced to the alternative of witnessing the fury of the flames which were devouring the unfortunate child. No cry of alarm, or for relief, was heard, but a removal of the smoking ruins that had accumulated in the cellar, revealed his charred bones.

Sims, the Fugitive.—The fugitive Sims, who was sent back to slavery from Boston, was at last accounts occupying apartments in the County Jail at Savannah. It is said that on landing from the brig he made a speech, in which he denounced the abolitionists, and congratulated himself that he had been once more permitted to tread the hospitable soil of Georgia. Perhaps he did so, and perhaps the story is told for effect. Whether he talked that way to blind the eyes of his Georgia owners, or whether they talk that way to blind his abolition friends, is a question. All accounts represent Sims as an intelligent and shrewd man. If the slaveholders do not "gain a loss" by getting him back, we shall be mistaken.

Revivals in Western New York.—The Genesee Evangelist remarks, that "for many years the churches in that region have not witnessed a season like the present. The cloud of mercy appears to be general, and its fertilizing contents are enriching many churches."

Delegates to the Eastern Association.—If delegates to the Eastern Association, who expect to go by way of New York and Troy, would send their names to this office, it might save unnecessary trouble in arranging for conveyance from the latter place to Berlin.

Foreign News.

The Cunard Steamer Asia, from Liverpool, arrived at New York April 23d, with European news three days later than was brought by the Pacific. Many bets were pending in England upon the passage of the Pacific and the Asia. The Pacific made much the best time.

In the record of English movements we find nothing worth copying.

In France a new Cabinet has been announced—a very common event for that country in these days.

Accounts from Christiana state that disturbances have again broken out at Drontheim and its vicinity. The military and burgher guards were compelled to interfere, and several arrests took place.

On the 6th April the line of railway from Dresden to Prague, completing the southern line of communication with Vienna, was opened. The railroad runs from Dresden through the finest part of the valley of the Elbe.

A letter from Constantinople of March 25 says: The Sultan has refused to accede to tye demands of Austria to exclude M. Kossuth and seven of his companions in exile from the benefit of liberation, and the Austrian Minister has referred to Vienna for fresh instructions.

The Chamber of Nobility of Sweden was occupied at Stockholm March 27th, with a proposition tending to accord to the Jews the same civil and political rights as are enjoyed by dissenting Christians in Sweden. One member only, Count de Hartmannsdorff, opposed the proposition, and in particular dwelt on the fact that the Jews habitually practiced usury. A great number of the principal members defended the proposition, and M. Weidenjelm showed from statistical tables, that for the last forty years no Jew was condemned in Sweden for any great crime. The proposition was, however, rejected by 78 votes to 18.

Death of an Indian Chief.

Dro-ne-ho-ga-web, a Chief of the Senecas, died at Tonawanda, in this State, on Friday, March 11. This Chief was generally known among the whites by the name of John Blacksmith. He was a most determined and fearless defender of the rights of his brethren against the encroachments of the "pale faces," and his name may be found to several important treaties at Washington. He was always a zealous opponent of the Land Speculators, and frequently came in contact with them in courts of Justice, and we believe on one or two occasions actually forced some of them to leave the Indian territory. He was strictly temperate in his habits, and was regarded by the Six Nations as their greatest Chief since the death of Red Jacket.

According to the customs of the red men, a runner was dispatched to the Six Nations, consisting of the Oneidas, Onondagas, Tuscaroras, Mohawks, Cayugas and Senecas, with intelligence of the death of their great Chief. The runner to the Onondaga Nation passed through Syracuse on Monday, and on approaching the Council House of the Onondagas, raised the cry of lament, which was understood by the tribe, who happened to be assembled in the Council House at the time. A messenger was dispatched to meet the runner, who was still some distance from the Council House. Upon meeting the runner, the Onondaga, who understood from the peculiar cry that he was the bearer of bad news, addressed a few words to him in the Indian dialect, of which the following is said to be a correct translation: "Let it come forth, that our minds may also drop down." The sad news was then communicated to the Onondaga, and the two proceeded to the Council House, where a large number of the nation were assembled, and all the particulars of the sad intelligence communicated to them by the runner. A string of black beads, the token of the death of a great Chief, which is always carried by the bearer of the mournful news, was then passed from hand to hand round the Council, and other tokens of mourning were exhibited. The occasion was one of great interest, as the Chief whose death they were called to lament, was universally beloved and esteemed by the Six Nations over whom he exercised authority.

A Pastoral Invitation Withdrawn.—It was announced some days since, says the Baltimore Patriot, that the Rev. Thomas K. Beecher had been elected Pastor of the Associate Reformed (late Rev. Dr. Duncan's) Church of this city. Since then it has been ascertained, through written communications received from Mr. Beecher, that he entertains opinions on the subject of Slavery at variance with those held by the people, and supported by the laws of this State. And inasmuch as the members of this Church, like our citizens generally, are opposed to the agitation of a question which has of late been exercising so unhappy an influence over the peaceful relations, civil and political, of some portions of our country, they very wisely and promptly determined to withdraw the invitation extended to Mr. Beecher, and thus avoid the unpleasant result which of necessity would have followed the declared intention to assail that domestic institution. Accordingly, at a meeting of the members and pew holders, a resolution was adopted by a very large vote recalling that invitation.

The Church Suit.—The suit between the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, plaintiffs, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, defendants, will be tried in the United States Circuit Court in New York City, on the 13th of May. Daniel Lord, of New York, Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, and Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, appear for the plaintiffs, and E. L. Faucher and George Wood, of New York, and Rufus Choate, of Massachusetts, for defendants.

An old house is about to be demolished in Newburyport, Mass., in which originated the witchcraft delusion in this country. It was built upwards of two hundred years ago, by Wm. Morse, whose wife narrowly escaped being hanged as a witch. Seventeen persons testified against her. Cotton Mather says that in the year 1679, this house was "so infested with demons," that whereas before, "the devil was chained up, the invisible hand did begin to put forth an astonishing visibility."

The Lewis County Bank.—A letter from the Cashier of the Lewis Co. Bank, dated on the 18th of April, says that its circulation at that date had been reduced to $55,000 Mr. Andrew White of Albany has made a report of the result of his investigation into the condition of this bank. He states that the aggregate amount of assets known as bills "receivable discounted," is $234,557 80. Of this sum $186,927 75 is due from E. N. Hamilton, treasurer, and F. Hollister, agent. The balance of these bills is supposed to be good. The bank has obtained judgment against three manufacturing mills to the amount of $173,897 46, as security for the payment of the bills discounted for Messrs. Hollister and Hamilton. These, and the amounts advanced by Mr. Hollister, $24,139 09, will secure the debt, and when converted into money will enable the Bank to renew its business, and to pay the stockholders more than dollar for dollar on their stock, beside leaving abundant funds to redeem all its outstanding circulating notes. If the judgments should not be converted at once into money, then other means will be required to provide for the payment of the notes unredeemed, and which, according to the ordinary course of business, must present themselves during the next sixty or ninety days, at the Bank of the redeeming agent at Albany. The Erie Railroad Finished.—The iron track from Piermont to Dunkirk is at length completed, and the first train passed over the road on Tuesday, April 22. The Directors left New York on Monday, stopped for the night at Elmira, and arrived at Dunkirk about 6 o'clock on Tuesday evening, amid the rejoicings of thousands, who had gathered to witness the advent of the first train of cars from the banks of the Hudson. The Committee remained at Dunkirk Tuesday night, and on Wednesday afternoon started on their return. The road was found to be in excellent order. A freight train commenced running April 28th, but as the steamers on the Lakes will not be ready to commence their trips until the middle of May, the express trains will not commence running until that time. Steamboat Explosion at Oswego.—On Monday, April 21st, the Canadian steamer Comet, running between Hamilton and Montreal, burst her boiler just as she was leaving her dock at Oswego. She immediately commenced sinking; but as her stern line was fast, she had not got out into the river, and swung slowly around to the dock again. Fortunately, there were no passengers on board, or the loss of life would probably have been great, as the explosion was terrific. Several of the crew were killed, or so wounded that they died in a short time. John Davis and James Carroll, Engineers of the boat; John O'Connor and James Church, waiters, and Thomas Quiggin, foreman, are dead. Three are missing and are supposed to have been blown into the river. The Jury returned a verdict that the explosion occurred from the want of water in the boiler.

A Catastrophe in Canada.—The Yamaska river, that runs through the French Seignories, on the East side of the river St. Lawrence, and about twenty miles below Montreal, has broken its banks. About seventy-two acres have fallen in, carrying with them three houses, out-houses, with the cattle and horses in them. One woman and two children were drowned. The husband has gone mad with fear, and a number of other persons have been injured. The inhabitants of the immediate neighborhood have lost three or four thousand cords of wood, and those who live on the banks of a neighboring river, have lost as much more, in consequence of the rise of the water. The debouching of the water over the country has done considerable damage in consequence of its violence.

Another Fugitive Slave Case was brought before the U. S Commissioner, Mr. McAllister, at Harrisburg, April 22. The alleged fugitives, a man, woman, and child, were arrested at Columbia, on warrant. From the evidence adduced before the Commissioner, it was proved that Daniel Franklin was the slave of Dr. Robert Franklin, of Ann Arundel Co., Md., and that Ally Franklin, the wife of Daniel, and their child, Caroline, about three years of age, were the slaves for life of Barbara Walles, of Baltimore City. Immediately after the hearing, the usual certificate was made out under Act of Congress, and the fugitives remanded to their owners.

The late remarkable passage of the Pacific has been the town's talk. The Pacific sailed from New York for Liverpool on the 23d March, and arrived on her return on the 19th April. The Asia sailed from New-York for Liverpool on the 26th March, and arrived back on the 23d April, each having completed the voyage in their twenty-eight days. The Asia made the shortest run Eastward, and the Pacific the shortest Westward; the former was 10 days 4 hours and some minutes; the latter, 10 days 2 hours and some minutes mean time.

The Springfield (Ill.) State Register says immigration is pouring into that region beyond all precedent. Upwards of eighty families—nearly all wealthy—have come in this Spring, and hundreds more are coming. Improved farms are in great demand, and new farms are opening in every direction. This improved state of things has been brought about partly by the construction of the Springfield and Naples Railroad, but more especially by the anticipated completion of the Alton and Springfield Railroad.

A Wilmington paper states that the law recently passed by the Legislature of Delaware to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from entering that State, does not apply to persons who are in the employ of citizens of other States, and sent by their employers on business into the State of Delaware. If parties are arrested under such circumstances, it is said they may obtain immediate release by applying to a Judge under the law of 1823.

On the 22d of April, an extensive break occurred on the Glen's Falls Canal Feeder. The water is yet running. It commenced on the heel path, about eighty rods below the rock section of the feeder—passed under the line of the canal, and discharged through the towing path, sweeping every thing to the rock. [At last accounts it was repaired.

SUMMARY.

A dispatch dated Washington, April 22, says: Those who have claims for Bounty Lands under the late act will find it necessary to exercise some considerable degree of patience. The number of applications received in a day have run up as high as 1,500. They now average about 400 a day. There are 100,000 applications on file which have not been touched. The number of warrants which the department has found it practicable to issue is about 200.

The St. Louis Republican states that Mr. J. B. Moulton County Engineer, is to be dispatched by the County Court to the portions of New York and the adjoining States, where plank roads are most in use, for the purpose of collecting information on the subject of the best mode for their construction, as well as all other information which can be of use to us in the early stage of our plank road making.

The United States Land Office, the State Land Office, and the Telegraph Office, at Defiance, Ohio, were burned on the 10th April. All the valuable papers of the Land Office, and the plates and papers connected with the current business, were destroyed. The land titles to the land in nearly one-half of the State is connected with these burned records. A few of the papers and plates of the State Land Office were saved.

The United States maintains six naval spuadrons (each of the six stationed, according to President Fillmore, in "different quarters" of the globe,) which cost annually several millions of dollars. During the existence of the government, the salaries of our naval officers have amounted to $80,000,000, the sum paid for active duty has been $20,000,000, actual pay for officers not in actual service $60,000,000.

The Greenville (S. C.) Southern Patriot says:—"We know of some gentlemen of wealth and worth who are about leaving South Carolina, on account of the continued political turmoil and warfare with the General Government which charaterizes her. If she persists in her mad scheme of secession, her best citizens will leave her in droves, and move, as one told us a few days since, 'into the United States.'"

During 1850 Wisconsin received an accession of eighteen Presbyterian and Congregational ministers, all of whom have found fields of labor, and are now preaching the Gospel in that State. Thirteen churches were formed during the same time, and five have been organized since the commencement of the present year.

At the late term of the Circuit Court in Westchester County, Z. J. McMaster and Jacob T. Merritt obtained a verdict of $14,188 54 against the Agent of the Sing Sing Prison. The suit was for damages sustained by a fire caused by the carelessness of the officers of the Prison. Within the past three years there have been about $40,000 recovered against the State.

The Rochester Daily Advertiser says that the Committee appointed for the purpose of selecting grounds for the State Fair, have made choice of a lot on the premises of Simeon Draper, Esq., on North-st., just over the railroad. The place henceforward will be known as "Floral Lawn"—poetic and appropriate, and bestowed by the proprietor.

Within a few days past a number of half-grown locusts have been turned up by the spade in several apple orchards at Hagerstown, Maryland. This is remarked as an indication that they are approaching the surface of the ground, and is confirmatory of their predicted periodical return in great multitudes during the present year.

A furious storm passed over North Alabama and Georgia on the night of the 7th and 8th inst. In attempting to cross the Caney Branch, six miles below Montgomery, six horses attached to the stage were drowned; the three passengers and driver saved themselves by climbing a tree.

New Orleans papers of the 16th April, contain dates from Galveston to the 13th. The bodies of seven men supposed to have been killed by Indians have been found near Corpus Christi. Hundreds of emigrants from Missouri, Arkansas, and other States, as well as foreigners, are flocking into Texas.

The Erie Railroad brought to our markets one day last week seven tuns of wild pigeons. Since the pigeon season commenced, probably not less than seventy-five tuns have found their way to this city, principally from the counties of Steuben and Allegany. The country in some places is completely covered with the migrating squadrons.

The St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette says that a number of emigrants have arrived at that place, mostly for Oregon. They all speak of considerable companies who are to follow. Among the emigrants to Oregon are several missionaries sent out by the Baptist Home Missionary Society.

Late advices state that the most intense excitement prevails at Havana with regard to another invasion, and so confidently was it expected, that the troops had been ordered to sleep on their arms, and be ready for marching at a moment's warning. The vessels of war in port have been ordered to be ready for action.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. Edwards, E. A. Park, and M. Stuart, of Andover; Dr. Robinson and H. B. Smith, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has been received in the short time which has elapsed since the union was made public, and the universal approbation of the measure which the publisher is daily receiving through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

Terms.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the Bibliotheca Sacra, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf with marbled edges, at $25 00.

☞ Orders should be addressed to

Miscellaneous.

Keep it Before the People.

Keep it before the people
That the earth was made for man,
That the flowers were strewn
And fruits were grown
To bless and never to ban;
That sun and rain
And corn and grain
Are yours and mine, my brother—
Free gifts from Heaven,
And freely given
To one as well as another!

Keep it before the people
That man is the image of God,
Whose limbs or soul
Ye may not control
With shackle, or shame, or rod!
We may not be sold
For silver or gold—
Neither you nor I, my brother—
For freedom was given
By God, from Heaven,
To one as well as another!

Keep it before the people
That famine and crime and wo
Forever abide,
Still side by side,
With luxury's dazzling show;
That Lazarus crawls
From Dives' halls,
And starves at his gate, my brother—
Yet life was given,
By God from Heaven,
To one as well as another!

Keep it before the people
That the laborer claims his meed—
The right of soil,
And the right to toil,
From spur and bridle freed;
The right to bear
And the right to share
With you and me, my brother,
Whatever is given,
By God from Heaven,
To one as well as another!

Adventures of a Sea Captain.

From the Hartford Daily Times.

The family of Captain Reuben Kellogg, of this city, were surprised—most agreeably, however—at his sudden appearance among them on the 14th inst. They had given him up as lost, supposing that he was dead, as they had good reason to suppose. His story is a singular one. He has been through the most startling dangers and the most extraordinary scenes.

He left San Francisco on the 9th of last October, as a passenger in the ship Powhattan, Capt. Hopkins, bound to Panama. There were 170 passengers on board, and it was soon found that the ship was not provided as well as it was advertised she would be. Indeed, the passengers were put upon an allowance of water, and there was much dissatisfaction. Captain Hopkins became alarmed, and called Capt. Kellogg to his room and told him he feared trouble—that there were indications which led him to believe that the passenger were about to take charge of the ship.

Capt. Kellogg told him the passengers were well disposed; that they only asked for fair treatment, and if the ship would put into the first port and get water, all would be well. Capt. Hopkins said he would put in if the passengers would sign a petition requesting him to do so. A petition was drawn up and signed by over 100 passengers. Capt. Hopkins then made for Tehuantepec Bay, and was becalmed at the westward of it. Capt. Hopkins requested Capt. Kellogg to select a boat's crew and go into the Bay and find a passage for the ship. He took nine men, with lead lines, &c., and after rowing all day, and not finding any landing place, they put back and got on board the ship at 12 o'clock at night. This was on the 20th November.

On the 22d November the ship was again anchored, having run down the coast a considerable distance, a point of land being within four miles of her. It was supposed the bay was round this point. But it afterward proved that it was not the bay. Capt. Kellogg and a crew of nine men (part of the former crew) rowed round this point at 8 o'clock A. M., and found it was only a bend in the coast, and that there was no bay there. They continued to row up the coast to find a landing place. At 2 o'clock P. M., to their surprise, they lost sight of the ship, but proceeded up the coast till 4 o'clock, when the men gave out, being exhausted, hands blistered, &c. A norther was springing up, and Captain Kellogg saw at once that he must land or be sent out to sea. Capt. K. then went on the top of a hill about 300 feet above the sea, and looked for the ship, but she was out of sight and they saw no more of her. They could not account for such rascality. The norther was not so strong as to drive a ship to sea, and there was no good reason for leaving ten men upon the coast without provisions and among hostile Indians.

From the hill, Capt. Kellogg discovered a ranche about three miles to the northward. He at once told his men that their only course was to repair to the ranche, and after reloading their revolvers they did so. It proved to be occupied by three Mexicans, who were stationed there to sell salt. They were friendly, and provided the men with provisions and water, this being the only place along the coast where water could be had.

After staying here two days, they procured a guide and started for the town of San Matao, about thirty miles eastward, a place of about 700 people. They crossed the Tehuantepec River, and arrived at Matao about 8 o'clock at night. The cholera was raging badly, and the men procured another guide the next day and left for Saramaree, about twelve miles up the coast—a place of about 200 people. From here they went to Tehuantepec, a place of about 12,000. There was a revolution here, and they found about 2,000 Indians, headed by Gen. Malindries, outside of the place, trying to take it by storm, but being short of amunition, they finally gave it up.

Here Capt. Kellogg was taken with the cholera, within half an hour after his arrival; and in about an hour later, Mr. Henry Crann, of Boston, who was taking care of him, was also taken. Mr. Crann died in four hours. This was on the 28th of November. Capt. Kellogg was sick at this place for 47 days. His companions, believing that he could not live, left him on the 29th of November, and proceeded on their way across the country to Vera Cruz. Two of their number, Mr. James Wetherspoon and Alonzo Vreeland, died on the route. Six of them arrived at Vera Cruz, and from there sailed for their homes in the States.

After his 47 days of terrible sickness, Capt. Kellogg left Tehuantepec for Manititlan, where he was detained 45 days. After waiting 45 days he rode on horseback 60 miles to the San Juan River, and proceeded 90 miles down that river in a canoe, with two Indians. This brought him to Clactalpo, on the Alvarado River—a place of about 3,000 people. Here he took a steamboat for Vera Cruz, and arrived there on the 16th of March.

Flax vs. Cotton.

From the Cleveland True Democrat.

Some considerable inquiry has of late been made in relation to the probabilities of a sufficient supply of flax cotton in the Northern States in case there should be a demand for it for manufacturing purposes. The following data, gleaned from reliable sources, will be satisfactory to those interested in the growth of cotton, or the manufacture of linen therefrom.

The annual imports of fine linens average about $6,500,000, and the wholesale prices of these cloths range as high as to average 65 cents per yard; while the retail prices go up to 95 cents and $1 20 per yard.

In 1840 the number of acres of land on which grain, &c., was grown in ten of the Northern States, was about 29,000,000; and the flax crop of that year in all of the States north of the Ohio River, including Maryland, covered some 4,000,000 acres.

The average crop of flax lint is about 350 lbs. per acre, of which one-third, or say 120 lbs., is flax cotton, leaving 120 lbs. of coarse tow for paper, bagging, or any other article it will make.

The flaxseed is about 19 bushels per acre, and is generally worth $1 per bushel.

We may readily suppose that in all the States suitable for the growth of flax, 8,000,000 of acres could now be turned to that crop without at all disturbing the present serial crop, or diminishing the quantity now devoted to the culture of other crops.

This basis gives us the following results:

8,000,000 acres, average, 120 lbs. flax cotton per acre,	960,000,000 lbs.
8,000,000 acres, average 15 bushels seed per acre,	120,000,000 lbs.
8,000,000 acres, average 230 lbs. flax tow, rough, per acre,	1,840,000,000 lbs.

This being sufficiently near the amount of such a crop of flax, the following figures give us the value of the same, as near as we can determine from our present limited knowledge of its properties:

960,000,000 lbs. flax cotton at 7c. per lb. at factory,	$67,200,000
120,000,000 bush. seed at $1 per bush. at factory,	120,000,000
1,840,000,000 lbs. coarse tow at 3c. per lb. at factory,	55,200,000
Total,	$242,400,000

The cotton crop of '49 and '50 was about 2,200,000 bales, at say 400 lbs. per bale; and the price averaged 11⅓ cts. per pound—value, $90,400,000.

The flax cotton would be 2,400,000 bales of 400 lbs. each, giving above the present average of cotton, 200,000 bales.

The difference in the total value of the two crops would be $132,000,000 in favor of the flax crop. Allowing these estimates to be high, still $132,000,000 is quite a margin to work on.

For the new Leavitt machinery, the flax may be either mowed or cradled, so that the harvesting of the crop may be done on the cheapest possible scale.

Farmers would do well to consider these facts, and act accordingly; for that there will be a demand for their flax crop of the coming season, there can be little doubt.

Those who raise flax should, after threshing the seed, bind up the stalk in convenient bundles to handle. It should then be laid as even as possible, and in this condition stacked away and covered with straw, to dry and prepare for the market.

Indian Adventurers.

A correspondent of the National Era, writing from Santa Fé, January 31, gives the following pleasant sketch of the famous Kit Carson, and another Indian Adventurer:—

The world-renowned Kit Carson has been here for some days past. You would not suppose from a glance at the man that he was the hero of so many border exploits—the terror of the wild nomad, the far-famed Kit Carson. I was disappointed at first sight of the man, and so perhaps would any one be, who had heard merely of the character and exploits of the man, without having seen a minute description of his contour. It was only when I came closely to analyze his features that I detected the real Kit. He was not dressed in the outlandish habiliments with which fancy, since the days of Boone, instinctively invests the hunter and the trapper, but in genteel American costume. How he dresses when domiciled in his own rancheria I do not know now, but perhaps shall sometime during the coming Spring or Summer. Carson is under the medium hight, but his frame is exceedingly well-knit, muscular, and symmetrically proportioned. His hair, a light auburn, and worn long, falls back from a forehead high, broad, and indicating more than a common share of intellect. The general contour of the face is not handsome, and yet not unpleasing. But that which at once arrests, and almost monopolizes your attention, is the eye; such an eye! gray, searching, piercing, as if with every glance he would reach the very well-springs of thought, and read your very silent imaginings. In the language of Byron,

> "——— the wild sparkle of his eye seemed caught
> From high, and lightened with electric thought."

Whether a better acquaintance will warrant the expectations excited by the outward appearance, I cannot yet tell.

But Kit is not altogher a sui generis in border exploits and notoriety. There is another man here at this time, who, though not world-renowned, is no less known and feared by all the nomadic tribes of savages, from the Colorado to the Arkansas. Not even the name of Kit Carson, I have been told, will sooner set the Indian Camp in motion, and put them all on the qui vive, than the name of Hatcher. This man is a little taller, I think, than Kit, but more slenderly made; sandy hair, light, small, blue eyes, keen in their glance, slightly inclining to a squint, and continually dancing and flashing about, as if all the time looking out for a Navajoe or an Apache. His face and head are rather small than otherwise, and do not indicate as much intellectuality as Kit's. His movements are of the most mercurial kind, so that you are not long in making up your mind to the verdict, that if caught, it will not be napping. Such are the two men whose names carry more terror into the camp of the Navajoes, Apaches, Cammanches, Ctaios, and Rappahoes, than a whole regiment of armed infantry.

A Streak of Luck.

At the late Custom-House sale of unclaimed bonded goods, thirty-two large packages were set up by the auctioneer in one lot, "supposed," as he said, "to contain a lighthouse." This being the only intimation bidders had of the contents, offers were dull, and the lot was knocked down at $500 to a German of the name of Stephen Lutz, who, being in the china and glass business, was probably led to make the highest offer, by the prospect of obtaining material of certain and immediate value. The largest of the above packages was found to present a surface seven feet square, and the smallest of five feet square, with a depth for the former of four feet, and the latter of three. It appears that none of the packages had as yet been opened, and, subsequently apprehensive of the value of his purchase, the purchaser took in four other partners, also Germans, "for better or worse." On opening the largest package, a large wheel of copper was found, adorned with curious devices, and evidently fitted for the most complicated machinery. Other cases were found to contain the looked-for lenses and immediate apparatus of a lantern. The searchers, at an early stage of the examination, having satisfied themselves that the supposed light-house was an actual verity, and by inquiry as to the location of the lot during the past twelve months and the mode of sale, that they had all its parts complete, discontinued operations, and from that time to this, have received from the few acquainted with their bargain, various offers, the highest of which reaches $7,000. On this they for some time wavered, but finally declined. Two conjectures have been hazarded as to this work of art, which all the pieces yet come to light, serve to show is of great beauty and value. There are, indeed, evident marks of its having been forwarded to this country by the French Government, and that it was intended for the American Government, and the two conjectures have hardly more than room enough to play upon the terms upon which it was transmitted, whether by purchase of our own, or grant from the French Government. The parties who hold the property are inclined, we believe, to wait the issue, previous to transferring it, at any price, to other hands. The lot was originally consigned to a naval officer, whose death accounts for its having been unclaimed. It is possible that the light house acquired in so extraordinary a manner, may prove to be of the value of $30,000. [Cour. & Enq.

Marrying a Man who Advertised for a Wife.

An affair, somewhat novel and exciting, took place in the village of Cutchogue, L. I., a few days since. It appears that Joseph Baker, of that place, and late of Greenport, went to New York a few weeks ago, for the purpose of obtaining a wife. His first move was to publish a notice in the New York Sun, stating that a young widower, about 25 years of age, having one child and a farm at a short distance in the country, wished to enter a second time into the matrimonial state, with some respectable lady, of about his own age.

This notice attracted the attention of a young girl in the city, aged some 18 or 19 years, by the name of Elsie Craig, who soon responded to Joseph's notice. This was followed by an interview between the parties.

According to the account which the girl gave at Cutchogue, Mr. Baker represented himself to her to be a gentleman of character and respectability, in the community where he lived; that he had a valuable farm down on Long Island, with a good house, pleasantly situated, and all the necessary improvements and appurtenances; that he kept cows and other stock, together with a horse, carriage, &c.

After a negotiation of a number of days, a matrimonial engagement was entered into, which was finally consummated in due form, by a clergyman of the city. After the marriage ceremony was solemnized, the parties, accompanied by the mother of the bride, immediately left the city to visit the splendid establishment of Mr. Joseph Baker, at Cutchogue, on Long Island, with high hopes and pleasing anticipations, no doubt.

On arriving at Mr. Baker's handsome country residence, behold it was not there! Nothing but a little shanty, situated in a lonesome, out-of-the-way place, with every indication of indolence and poverty, instead of a neat, comfortable dwelling, presented itself to the astonished strangers. The poor girl and her mother, after taking a fair view of the premises, and discovering the imposition, and the manner in which the daughter had been duped, overwhelmed with disappointment, mortification, and disgust, at once decided to return to the city.

After making proper inquiries respecting the character, habits, and circumstances of the said Joseph Baker, as they were understood in that community, they declared that the marriage was brought about by false pretenses, misrepresentations, and hypocrisy. A lawyer and a justice were soon called in, to untie the matrimonial knot, which had so recently and so imprudently and foolishly, on the part of the girl, been formed by the parties.

Educate the Farmer.

It is calculated that the division of the occupations of the men in the United States, is nearly in the following proportions:—

No. engaged	in internal navigation,	33,076
" "	on the ocean,	56,022
" "	the learned professions,	65,255
" "	commerce,	119,607
" "	manufactures,	791,749
" "	agriculture,	3,719,951

Thus it will be seen that those who are engaged in agriculture, are three and a half times greater in number than those of all other divisions. The agriculturists therefore have the physical numerical power, and can, at any time, control every government in the United States, and give tone to public opinion. But do they? No, indeed, for however powerful they may be in number, they are weak in influence, and this arises from the want of proper education. The sixty-five thousand two hundred and fifty-five, engaged in the learned professions, are intellectually stronger than the three millions seven hundred and nineteen thousand nine hundred and fifty-one, engaged in agriculture, and therefore rule them. If it were not so, seven-eighth of the offices in the country would not be held by lawyers and doctors; nor would all the colleges and high schools be endowed principally for the learned professors.

Farmers, when will you arouse yourselves to the dignity and importance of your calling, and educate yourselves to the hight of intelligence which will make you the rulers instead of the ruled of other professions? There is surely nothing to prevent this; only be true to yourselves. [Agriculturist.

Anecdote of Richard III.

In the town of Leicester, the house is still shown where Richard III. passed the night before the battle of Bosworth; and there is a story of him still preserved in the corporation records, which illustrates the caution and darkness of that Prince's character. It was the custom to carry, among the baggage of his camp, a cumbersome wooden bed, which he pretended was the only bed he could sleep in. Here he contrived a receptacle for his treasure, which lay concealed under a weight of timber. After the fatal day on which Richard fell, the Earl of Richmond entered Leicester with his victorious troops; the friends of Richard were pillaged, but the bed was neglected by every plunderer as useless lumber. The owner of the house afterwards discovered the hoard, became suddenly rich without any visible cause. He bought lands, and at length arrived at the dignity of being mayor of Leicester. Many years afterwards, his widow, who had been left in great affluence, was murdered for her wealth by her servant maid, who had been privy to the affair; and at the trial of this woman and her accomplices, the whole transaction came to light.

Strength of the Spider.

The intelligence and power evinced by the spider, in securing its prey, has attracted attention; but we have seldom heard of so remarkable a display of these faculties as we witnessed a few days since. A small sized spider had made his web on the under side of a table. Early one morning a cockroach was noticed on the floor, directly under the web, and on approaching to take it away, it was found that the spider had thrown a line round one of its legs, and while the observer was looking at it, the spider came down and lassoed the opposite leg of the cockroach. The spider then went to his web, but instantly came down and fastened a line to another leg, and continued for several minutes darting down and fastening lines to different parts of the victim. The struggle of the cockroach (though a full grown one) were unavailing to effect his escape—he could not break his bonds, and his efforts seemed only to entangle him more. As his efforts became more and more feeble, the spider threw his lines more thickly around him; and when he had become nearly exhausted, the spider proceeded to raise him from the floor. This he did by raising one end at a time. He at first raised the head and forward part of the body nearly half an inch; then raised the other end; and so continued to work until the cockroach was elevated five or six inches from the floor. Thus, "hung in chains," the victim was left to die. The spider was, as before remarked, a small one, and could not have been more than one-tenth of the weight of his prey. [Noah's Messenger.

Hydropathy.

The water-cure is thought by many persons to be a modern discovery; but there is probably not one of its processes that has not been practised somewhere, and by somebody, ever since men were afflicted with disease. In England, more than fifty years ago, Dr. Wright cured fever by wrapping his patients in a wet blanket. Dr. Smith, formerly a medical professor of Dartmouth and Yale, used to pour buckets of cold water over his typhus patients, in bed, and let them lie in the water. Rush gave the cold water dash in yellow fever. Bruce says that people in the interior of Africa cure malignant fevers with a constant bath of cold water. Galen treated all his fever patients with cold water. Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, when he felt a fit of the gout coming on, used to plunge his foot in a bucket of cold water. "In Sicily," says Briclone, the tourist, "they cure fevers by giving ice-water to drink, and covering the breast and belly with snow and ice." A Dutch physician in the West Indies cured the lockjaw with the wet sheet, before Priessnitz was born; yet Priessnitz has the the credit of this discovery, and rightly enough, perhaps, as the same idea may have occurred to many. [Noah's Mess.

A Remarkable Woman.—The Philadelphia North American of Friday says: Yesterday the widow Wilson, of Shippen st., widow of Capt. Andrew Wilson, was consigned to the grave in Pine st. church yard. In an address at her funeral, Rev. Dr. Brainerd said she was 86 years old, and had worshiped in Pine st. before the war of the Revolution, and ever since; that when the British held possession of Philadelphia, they not only converted Mrs. Wilson's church into a stable, but expelled herself and family from her dwelling south-east corner of George and South streets, to accommodate British officers; that, once sailing with her husband, Mrs. Wilson was captured on the high seas and taken a prisoner to Jamaica, where her force of will and language availed to protect a good part of her property. He might have added that she was in the receipt of two pensions from the General and State Governments; that she kept up an unbroken interest in all political affairs, and could sketch to the life prominent politicians; that her strength of character was unaffected by years; that she carried to life's close, unchanged by contact with new generations, the peculiarities formed in the early days of our land, and the most stormy period of our history. She was a character at once so unique and resolute, that she would have been a treasure to the genius of Walter Scott.

Collecting Debts in Michigan.—Among the acts adopted by the late Michigan Legislature, was one abolishing all laws for the collection of debt. Michigan has now in force the most of the National Reform measures. No Land Limitation Law has yet been enacted, although the homestead has long been exempted. A number of mercantile firms and dealers in Kalamazoo, since the adoption of the law relating to debts, have announced their intention of publishing the names of all delinquents, "being well convinced (as they say) that no man of good intentions and honorable principles will allow himself to be thus posted before his neighbors and fellow-citizens." "The honor of the man is hereafter to be the foundation of all ordinary transactions."

Diffusion of Knowledge.—A correspondent of the Gateshead Observer, in reference to a paragraph stating the fact that the booksellers of Newcastle had observed that most of the standard mathematical works were purchased by pitmen, gives an anecdote in point. He says:—"Some years since, a gentleman, on his passage from Newcastle to Shield in a steamboat, went into the engine-room, and found one of the books mentioned, namely, Emerson's Fluxions, lying on the table, rather black and smutty, evidently much read. He asked the young engine-man who read the book? He answered 'that he did when he had time.' Rather surprised at the fact, they entered freely into conversation; and from that time the stranger used all influence to bring the studious engine-man into notice. That engine-man is now a distinguished mathematician, and the author of many of the very works alluded to. He had, a short time previously to the interview, 'risen from a bank trapper to a breaks-man,' in a Newcastle coal-pit, as stated in evidence before the Lords' Committee last session; and is now—Professor Hann of King's College!"

The Interior of Africa.—The Liberia Advocate furnishes an account of a tour on foot by a missionary, 254 miles in the interior. The writer declares that the region is unsurpassed by any portion of the West Indies. It is an elevated country, with high ranges of mountains, extensive valleys, and fine undulating tracts lying between, well watered, and covered with valuable timber. The soil is fertile, supplying all the productions of the tropics with incredible rapidity and abundance. Cotton, coffee and tobacco, of the best quality, can be raised in any quantity. The region in the vicinity has great mineral wealth. Besides gold, the abundant production of which is well-known, iron ore is found of such purity that the natives are able to construct from it their knives and other instruments, without smelting, as it becomes at once, on being heated, sufficiently malleable for this purpose.

As an instance of what an extreme change is made by a simple and slight alteration of the proportions of the same ingredients, we may notice, that the antagonism between sweet and sour, as observed in sugar and vinegar, is owing only to a little more or a little less of carbon and water. Thus, if in one hundred parts about forty-two be carbon, and the rest be water, we shall have sugar; but if forty-seven parts be carbon, and the rest water, we shall have vinegar.

A man in Connecticut obtained a winter's supply of excellent potatoes in the following cute manner. He gave out that he was desirous of obtaining a specimen of the best sort of potatoes, and would pay $3 for a peck of such, himself to be the judge. Potatoes poured into his cellar from all the country around, and when the avalanche had subsided, the man handed over his three dollars for the best peck, and the next spring sold potatoes enough to more than cover the original outlay besides having a first quality of article for home use all winter.

A return to parliament has been printed, showing that on the 25th of March, last year, there were 27,351 boys in the workhouses of England and Wales, and 22,838 girls; making 50,819; being a decrease of 11 per cent. on the number in 1849. The illegitimate children amounting to 12,694, of 8,874 of whom the mothers were in the workhouse. The deserted children, whether by father, mother, or both, amounted to 8,354, and those whose fathers were transported, or suffering imprisonment for crime, to 1,328.

Mayor Kingsland has been fining the merchants of New York city for obstructing the side walks with their boxes, bales, and barrels of goods. Some of the sufferers retaliated by keeping watch over the large wholesale establishment of the Mayor, who is himself a merchant. The other day they caught the Mayor's employees napping, entered complaint before his honor, and obliged him to fine himself three hundred dollars.

In a weaving mill, near Manchester, England, where the ventilation was bad, the proprietor constructed a fan. The consequences soon became apparent in a curious manner. The operatives, little remarkable for olfactory refinement, instead of thanking their employer for his attention to their comfort and health, made a formal complaint to him that the ventilator had increased appetites, and that, therefore they were entitled to a corresponding increase of wages.

A quaint old gent, not a hundred miles from here, who is, withal, one of our active, stirring men, had a man at work in his garden who was quite the reverse. "Mr. Jones," said he to him, one morning, "did you ever see a snail?" "Certainly," said Jones. "Then," said the old boy, "you must have met him, for you could never overtake him."

A. O. Gardner, temporarily in charge of the Post Office at West Buffalo, Iowa, has been arrested on charge of having abstracted a check for $100 from a letter received at that Post office. Gardner is a lad of only 17 years of age. He obtained the money on the check.

A writer in Frazer's Magazine suggestes that to accommodate the immense crowd at the London Fair with "lodgings" who are barred out from feather beds in snug inns, that the River Thames shall be covered with rafts, on which lodging-rooms or stalls shall be constructed and let out at a cheap rate.

There was a serious railroad accident near Geneva, N. Y., on the 17th inst. The accommodation train ran into the express train, damaging five cars, and wounding four persons, one of whom died in a short time.

Reply to "Exodus"—Part 4.

"Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." Matt 5: 20.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—It is to be lamented that Discussion is so seldom the noble and beautiful thing it ought to be. As the handmaid of Truth, it should have only less than her queenly dignity, with all her captivating attractions. But this idea is not realized. Discussion is often introduced by one or both parties rashly, without competent knowledge, which, when associated with candor, is easily excused; but, what is infinitely worse, it is often maintained for a long time without any real and controlling love of Truth. More solitary study, more devout prayer to the Father of Lights, and more silent, patient discipline of the reasoning faculties, are much to be desired.

If I might illustrate my conception by a comparison, I would say, that Argument should be like the Crystal Palace now erecting in London; constructed, not for a party or nation, but for a world; of ample comprehension; of harmonious proportions; of pure and polished material; fitly framed, and firmly compacted with ligaments of iron, yet transparent throughout, and luminous with light from Heaven! Into such an Argument, supported by its broad foundations and solid pillars, might be introduced all the selectest productions of earth, wrought into the most useful and elegant forms, arranged in perfect order, exhibited to the highest advantage, and enlivened by the figures, costumes, and ideas of the various tribes which make up the great brotherhood of Man.

Neither my friend "Exodus," nor myself, claim to fully realize this high ideal; but even to recognize it, is something; to approach it practically nearer and nearer, will be no small attainment. May we aid one another by steady example, and sound because friendly criticism; jealous of the honor of Truth, rather than of our own reputation; thankful for the detection of our own unconscious errors; and, like Milton, writing—

"As ever in our great Taskmaster's eye."

6. Only one more proposition of "Exodus" remains to be considered. It is that "the Epistles uniformly regard the Sabbath as a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the Gospel dispensation."

It may seem a waste of time and strength to examine this last proposition minutely, after what has been said already. And happily, it is unnecessary to follow in detail my friend's argument from the Epistle to the Hebrews, as most of his remarks and reasonings are really sound and appreciating. I give him credit for a very careful study of the Apostle's train of thought, and exhaustive method of argument, on the passage quoted from Ps. xcv. 11. Only on two points of his conclusion, which indeed resolve themselves into one, do I see cause to differ from him. The first is, as to the character of the "rest that remaineth to the people of God," and the second, as to the time of entering into it. The first of these he understands to be simply a spiritual sabbatism, and the second, an immediate, as well as complete entrance into it, by faith, in the present world. A word on each of these.

The first opinion of "Exodus," (and particularly, not exclusively, of Dr. Gill,) rests on two grounds. 1. The general scope of the Epistle. This, I agree with my friend entirely, "is the Levitical symbolism of the Gospel," only I differ with him altogether when he says it is "without the slightest reference to a future life." On the contrary, it is with perpetual reference to a future life. Christ, says the Apostle, as "our forerunner, hath entered for us within the veil;" he is seated on the right hand of God in heaven; he reigns there as King; he officiates there as our High Priest and Intercessor; he speaks from thence as our Prophet, in distinction from Moses, "who spake on earth." He receives there at last those who "inherit the promises," even those "who draw not back unto perdition," but "believe to the saving of the soul." There the "elders who by faith obtained a good report," and "of whom the world was not worthy," are already entered; and we who follow them are said to "have here no continuing city, but to seek one which is to come." But enough. A future life, and the way, divinely ordained, to enjoy its blessings forever, are the very substance and soul of this Epistle to the Hebrews; all Rabbinic opinions, endorsed by Christian divines, of the phrase, "world to come," notwithstanding.

And 2d. This opinion of "Exodus" rests upon an inadequate conception of the context. For the particular scope of the Apostle, in the passage under consideration, is peculiarly directed to this doctrine of a future life. For he is here exhorting the Hebrews (iii. 6—19, iv. 1—13,) to beware lest, "through unbelief," they, like their fathers in the wilderness, fall under the irrevocable oath of exclusion from the Rest of God with Christ. This rest, of which God speaks so solemnly in Ps. xcv. 11, the Apostle proves, by the time of its mention there, cannot be either the rest of the original Sabbath, (Gen. ii. 2,) or the rest of Israel in Canaan, (Josh. i. 15,) both which were in the actual possession of the persons addressed in the time of David. Therefore it is a rest "which remaineth" still to be enjoyed by "the people of God," that is, by believers.

As to the time of entering it, "Exodus" lays unwarrantable stress upon the tense of the verb. "For we which believe do enter into rest." Whereas, the meaning evidently is, believers, (and they only) shall inherit it, not here, but hereafter. True, Christ now gives them rest, (Matt. xi. 28,) but only "rest to the soul," whereas the Apostle is speaking of the rest of the whole man with God, in the "city that hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God." (Chap. xi. 10.)

"Let us labor, therefore, to enter into that rest." This exhortation, "Exodus" thinks, refers exclusively to spiritual rest; "evidently (he says) not in a future sense." On the contrary, it is precisely parallel to the exhortation (vi. 11, 12, 19,) "we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence, to the full assurance of hope unto the end; that ye be not slothful but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil, whither the Forerunner hath for us entered, even Jesus," &c.

Having thus shown that "Exodus" has mistaken the Apostle's scope, it is easy to see that the argument he builds upon this passage to support his sixth proposition falls to the ground. The doctrine that "the Sabbath was merely a provisional type of the Gospel, fulfilled and superseded by it," finds, as I said at first, no support from the Epistle to the Hebrews. And if not there, where then? We have searched before in the Epistle to the Collossians (ii. 16, 17,) and it is not there. "Exodus" has affirmed that the "Epistles uniformly so regard it;" but a rigid examination, on philosophical and logical principles, finds no such doctrine in any one. And if not taught in the New Testament, of what avail is a dream of the Jewish Rabbins, or a happy metaphor of Justin Martyr in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, or the occasional allegorical expositions of other later Christian divines. "What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord." Even the great name of Calvin, generally the keenest of interpreters, or of Whately, generally the shrewdest of logicians, will merely prove that my friend errs in illustrious company, nor that he does not err.

My friend grows truly eloquent, and witty withal, in winding up his argument, especially on the oft-cited words, "Sabbath days" and "holy days," in Col. ii. 16, 17. I can admire eloquence and wit, even when directed against myself; especially when so evidently the offspring of a genial heart, and when at the time it seemed to him to have some foundation in truth. But as in Part II. of my Reply, I so fully answered the whole argument built on these words, and showed that his construction is at war with the fundamental doctrine of Christ as to the perpetuity of the Decalogue, it is unnecessary now to say a single word more. If I have not made "the trifling discovery of a Scriptural text half so explicit—half as unmistakeable," on my side, "of either of the six propositions," as that text is upon this, I have certainly no right to expect him to be convinced. But if I have fairly met him, at every point, with pertinent text and necessary interpretation, and historical fact, and logical reasoning, I may perhaps venture to hope he will remember his "promise" here, to "abandon the whole argument without reserve." The views I take of human nature in general, even in that case, would hardly lead me to anticipate such an unconditional surrender, without the interference of a Higher Power, whose hand is on the hidden places of the heart.

To that Higher Power, I do indeed earnestly look on behalf of my friend. And should so happy a result ensue from this discussion, I too here promise to the "Lord of the Sabbath," that it shall be hailed by me with the lowliest self-abasement, and with the warmest gratitude. No sweeter hope could cheer me in my labor of love than this, "If he hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother."

My friend throws himself in the last resort into Rom. xiv. 1, 5, 6, as into a citadel of impregnable strength. But candidly, now, what is Paul urging there? Forbearance with weak faith—with imperfect knowledge—with mistaken judgment—in true Christians, who, however they for the time doubt or differ as to the will of God, still with conscientious love do, or forbear to do, solely to please Him. See verses 1, 5, 9. Now mark one momentous distinction. As to "meats," the Apostle decides the question clearly, while urging forbearance, (verse 14;) whereas, in regard to "days," he leaves the question here undecided, as one of a more complicated nature, and requiring therefore the greater forbearance, in the existing relations between Judaism and Christianity. At the same time, he urges conscientious care in deciding this question on right grounds. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind," (verse 5.) He then forbids all uncharitable judgment of each other's motives, (verse 10,) and urges the utmost caution against every antinomian tendency, or uncharitable stretch of our Christian liberty, lest it should betray others into sin, and jeopard their salvation, (verse 13.) See also, to the same purpose, verses 15, 16, 19—23. His conclusion is, that "the strong in faith ought to bear the infirmities of the weak," and not to please but deny themselves, after the bright example of the meek and benevolent Saviour, xv. 1—7.

Now if this be the Apostle's real meaning, my friend has small occasion to triumph in this passage. For he can find in it no condemnation of a Christian Sabbath, express or implied. On the contrary, every tendency to overstrain Christian liberty to the injury of a brother's soul, is smitten as with lightning from heaven. If any wish to see the awful force of the expression, "Put a stumbling block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way," he may consult Matt. ii. 8, Matt. xviii. 6—14; Mark ix. 38—50; Rev. ii. 14, and 1 John ii. 10; where he will find various examples, and the most impressive warnings.

Notwithstanding my friend has indulged in a little witticism at my expense here, I hardly think, after reading my remarks on the passage in Collossians, in Part II. of my Reply, explaining the Apostle's standpoint, and illustrating his real aim, that he will again charge me, in any bad sense, with "an original mode of argument." It is sometimes the highest merit of a mode of argument that it is original, i. e. that it ascends to a higher point of view, from which seeming contradictions disappear in one grand and triumphant harmony of truth and reason. Whether mine has that merit I submit to the impartial. Since I am "fully persuaded in my own mind," that Christ, followed by Peter, and James, and Paul, and John, are on my side, I can look very calmly upon an occasional slight disagreement with such illustrious men as Luther, and Tyndale, and Gill, and Valpy, and Coleridge, and Clarke. Indeed, if the question simply were whether the Sabbath is now to be observed on Jewish principles, with the rigidity of Pharisaic constructions, or the severity of monkish superstitions, then I myself would adopt almost everything these great men have spoken, as my own. I plead for the obligation of the Sabbath, only as expounded, settled, and glorified by Jesus Christ.

On reviewing what I have written, I am pained at perceiving a certain air of egotism, which does not become a minister of Jesus. I know that something of this appearance is unavoidable in discussions which demand a free use of the personal pronoun. So far as it goes beyond this point of real necessity, I ask forgiveness of God and man.

I am happy that my friend "Exodus" is to have room allowed him to speak of the "two points" he desires to notice, and indeed of any other points involved.

On my friend's "serious question" in his closing paragraph, I remark but this: He put it before he knew the real strength of my position, and the utter weakness of his own at every point. The two positions are contradictory. They cannot both be true. "Exodus" has made a gallant stand against my first brief attack; but let him now look along the whole line of his defense, and see if one stone is left upon another.

And now, in conclusion, I submit it to him, with equal sincerity and seriousness, Have I not fairly met and overthrown every one of the "six propositions," which a few weeks ago he honestly thought were "undeniable," and able to "challenge refutation?" Have I not shown, by fair argument and authentic facts, that there is a Sabbath as early as Creation, and as perpetual as Christianity; that this Sabbath, as recognized in the Decalogue, is not ceremonial nor Jewish, but moral and universal; that Jesus never, (much less studiously,) violated, but vindicated and honored it; that the New Testament does uniformly, encourage its observance, and condemn its profanation; that it was not abrogated, nor even touched in "one jot or tittle," by the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem; and that it was not therefore merely a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the Gospel? In a word, have I not proved that it was inserted by our Lord, with the rest of the Decalogue, into the fundamental law of Christianity; exalted by a new association with the mightiest of God's works, the glorious work of human redemption; and observed by the Apostles and primitive Christians as the "Lord's day," "the chief of days," "our rest indeed?" Have I not shown, that this view embraces, harmonizes, and illustrates all the facts, testimonies, and representations respecting it, in Scripture and elsewhere, in a manner worthy of God, and beneficial to mankind; and is therefore as much entitled to universal credence and respect as the Newtonian Theory of gravitation in Physics, and for similar reasons, viz., that it admits all the phenomena; assigns to each its real character, relations, and force; and solves all the problems suggested by apparently contradictory facts.

The argument for the present is closed. I leave the subject in the hands of my readers, with this little Apologue, suggested by the occasion, and illustrative of my views.

THEION, the venerable king of OURANIA, had a daughter named EUSEBIA, whom he tenderly loved. At a very early age, he presented her with a beautiful necklace, composed of ten priceless pearls, fastened on a golden chain, each link of which was curiously inwrought with his own name. He clasped it round her neck with his own hand, and charged her to preserve it unbroken through her whole life, as the proof of her filial love. When she came of age, EUSEBIA formed the acquaintance of a gentleman by the name of APEITHOS. One day, on examining her beautiful necklace, he surprised her by pronouncing positively that one of the supposed pearls was but a paste imitation. In her curiosity to ascertain the fact, or indignation at the supposed imposition, she broke from her neck the golden band which bound them all together; and instantly, to her dismay, she beheld all the glittering pearls rolling in the dust, and trampled under foot by filthy swine. APEITHOS coldly turned away, and left her blinded with her tears, to collect them again as she could. But in vain she tried to clasp the golden chain as before. Filled with sorrow and shame, and fearful of her father's just displeasure, she sought her eldest brother CHRISTOS, and entreated his intercession. The generous Prince sympathized with her in her affliction, and proffered his best offices in her behalf. Soothed by his tenderness, and supported by his arm, she hastened to her father, at his feet confessed her fault, and implored his pardon. Her father, out of respect to her generous brother, kindly forgave her, and pressed them both to his bosom. He then commanded his Son's name to be engraved on the golden chain, together with his own, in perpetual memory of the event; and as he reclasped the golden band around her neck, charged her in future, by her filial and fraternal love, to beware of a second delusion, especially from the confident tone of a stranger. The key to this Apalogue will be found in Matt. v. 17—20.

A little African girl, who lived in the missionary house in Africa, was requested by a woman to steal some article, and bring it secretly to her. The child replied, "What shall I say when God speaks to me about stealing? and when I burn what shall I do?"

SPEAK KINDLY TO THE POOR.

Speak kindly to the poor!
  One little word, if imely said,
May tend to soothe a thousand cares—
  May dry the tear by sorrow shed.
Let no reproaches from thy lips
  Be breathed, which thou might'st not endure;
Oh, give of that which nothing costs!
  Speak kindly to the poor.

Look gently on the poor!
  And not be hasty to depart;
Beneath those homely garments throb
  Full many an honest heart.
Thy smile may shed a heaven of joy;
  A sunlight world hope ensure;
Oh, turn not then in scorn away!
  Look gently on the poor.

Be friendly to the poor!
  To such the promise has been given;
Despised and scoffed at here on earth,
  They shall inherit peace in heaven;
But, ah! how sad will by thy fate!
  Thou com'st to enter at the door,
And find'st no banquet there prepared
  For any save the poor!

RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF TRUSTEES.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser of April 16.

A question of grave importance has been for some time pending among the Baptists of New York city. It has within the last two days come to an issue before an Ecclesiastical Council, and is now a public matter.

In August last, the First Baptist church in New York, (Rev. Dr. Cone's,) at a regular church meeting, invited the American Bible Union—the new version Bible Society, formed last June—to hold its first annual meeting, which was to occur in October, in the house of worship occupied by that church. Not long afterwards, Dr. Cone made formal application to the Trustees of the church for the use of the house for that purpose. The question, whether the house should be used or not, seems to have awakened a good deal of interest in the church and congregation, and when the question came before the Trustees for decision, it was accompanied by a protest against the grant.

There are nine Trustees. Of these, eight were present, and the vote being a tie, (4 to 4,) the motion to grant was declared lost. The dissenting Trustees were Messrs. W. W. Todd, (President,) Z. Ring, Nathan C. Platt, and John M. Bruce, Jr. The two last named were communicants in the church; the two first were members of the congregation only. This refusal gave great offense to the church, which immediately passed a resolution that these gentlemen had all "violated their trust in its spirit, and ought to resign their places as Trustees." Messrs. Todd and Ring replied to this demand by letter, and Messrs. Platt and Bruce orally, that the trust which they held was a secular one, with which the church had not jurisdiction—that they were elected to their office by the pew-holders and contributors, under the laws of the State, and were responsible to those electors and amenable to those laws—that the sphere of the church was altogether spiritual, and that its action could be legitimate and binding only as confined within that sphere. At the same time, the great importance of harmony between the church and Trustees was conceded, and the duty of the latter so to administer their trust, as to promote the spiritual ends of the former. At a subsequent meeting of the Trustees, Mr. Joseph Durbrow, the Trustee who was absent at the previous meeting of the Board, being now present, a vote was passed declaring the office of treasurer vacant, and by another vote, Mr. Todd was elected to that office. This gentleman had been treasurer for twenty years, until 1848, when he resigned in consequence of the loss of his sight, which is now restored. This step likewise, gave offense to the church, and was made the subject of a condemnatory resolution. Mr. Durbrow voted for this change of treasurer, which was the only offense with which he was charged.

The evidence adduced, goes to show that by this time a pretty wide breach existed in the church and congregation. The minority seems to have been respectable as to numbers and character, but the far greater part of the church, at least, were opposed to the action of the Trustees, and were with the pastor in his new version views. In this state of things, Mr. Platt called upon the pastor, and, expressing his regret at these differences, proposed an arbitration; but this was declined by the church. This having failed, he went before the church, and proposed to put an end to all difficulty by resigning his place as Trustee, and taking a letter of dismission to another church, he said that he had fulfilled his duties as Trustee according to his best discretion and in good faith but he was unwilling to contend with the church, and for the sake of peace would resign and retire. Pending a motion to lay this proposition on the table, however, he withdrew it, to save from that disposition. As the next step, Messrs. Platt, Bruce and Durbrow, were cited to appear before the church to answer a charge of "disorderly conduct," under four particulars, (the charges against Mr Durbrow being confined to the third particular.)

1. For opposing the wishes of the church in regard to the use of the house for the anniversary of the Bible Union.
2. For not resigning their offices as Trustees when admonished so to do.
3. For removing the Treasurer.
4. For attending and favoring meetings of the minority of the church and congregation, which were adjudged to threaten the peace of the church and the permanency of the pastoral relation.

A certified copy of the vote of citation, with the charge and particulars annexed, was served upon these gentlemen by the clerk of the church, and they proceeded to propose answers. At the day specified, they appeared personally and offered their answers. They were met with the objection that written answers were inadmissible. They were expected to reply orally to such questions as the pastor might propose. This they declined to do. They had been cited in writing to answer, and had prepared answers which they were ready to present; but if these answers were declined, they had no others to make. They were accordingly excluded from the fellowship of the church at that meeting.

Believing their exclusion unauthorized and unjust, they at once made application to the Tabernacle Baptist church, Second Avenue, (Rev. Mr. Lathrop's,) for admission to that body, at the same time offering to submit their case to a Council. The Tabernacle church entertained the question, and through a committee, of which Mr. William Colgate, was chairman, invited the First church to unite with them in calling a mutual Council. This the First church declined. The Tabernacle church then proceeded to call a Council upon its own responsibility, and this Council met on Monday, April 14. Nearly all the Baptist churches of New York, Brooklyn, Williamsburg, Jersey City and Hoboken, were invited, with the First church in Boston, the First church in Providence, the Pearl Street church in Albany, the South church in Newark, and the Sansom Street church in Philadelphia. Of these thirty-one churches, all but four or five were represented, and of these four or five, all but one were in this city. The Rev. Morgan J. Rhees, of Williamsburg, was Moderator of the Council, and the Rev. William Verrinder, of Jersey City, Clerk.

The Council being organized, the Tabernacle church, through their committee, Messrs. William Colgate and William Winterton, laid before it the proceedings of that church in the case, concluding with the information, that since the declining of the First church to unite in calling the Council, that church had been invited to send delegates with information. To this last invitation, no answer had been returned.

The case was fully spread before the Council on Monday evening, in a document, the reading of which occupied two hours. This document was addressed to the Tabernacle church, by the applicants for admission, and, after a history of preceding events, presented the citations addressed to Messrs. Platt, Bruce and Durbrow, by the first church, with the answers, which they were not permitted to read, when on trial before that body. From this document has been gleaned the foregoing information. It should perhaps be added, that, in their answers, the gentlemen accused took the ground, that while they were bound to "hear the church," in all matters upon which it was within the province of the church to speak, for their acts as Trustees, performed conscientiously, in good faith, and according to their best discretion, and therefore involving no moral delinquency, they were responsible to those only who made them Trustees, and in whose behalf they acted, viz., the pew-holders and contributors. In regard to the minority meetings, alledged to be schismatical, they denied that they were so. These meetings, they said, were held for mutual counsel in embarrassing circumstances, and a denial of the right to hold them would be to invade the lawful and acknowledged rights of minorities. These answers concluded with a joint offer to submit the whole case to a mutual Council and abide the result.

The case being thus before the Council, all the documents pertaining to it were referred to the following committee: Rev. W. R. Williams, D. D., of New York; Rev. J. H. Granger, of Providence; Rev. R. H. Neale, D. D., of Boston; Rev. W. Hague, D. D., of Newark; and Hon. Ira Harris, of Albany. The Council then adjourned to meet at 4 P. M., on Tuesday.

At that hour the committee reported, setting forth what they deemed the nature and rights of independent churches, with their just and proper relations to each other. The report concluded with a series of resolutions, embodying the principles thus stated, and advising the Tabernacle church that, under the evidences presented to the Council, that church would be justified and approved by the churches generally, in receiving to membership the excluded persons.

The Rev. Mr. Eddy, of this city, moved a substitute for the report and resolutions, arriving at precisely opposite conclusions, and sustained his motion by a written argument of some length. The motion to substitute was, however, laid on the table, and the resolutions of the committee were readily adopted, until the final and essential one was reached. This was debated by the Rev. Drs. Williams, Welch and Dowling, Rev. Messrs. Granger, Backus and Sayres, (the two last named being opposed to the resolution,) and by Judge Harris. Judge Harris confined his remarks mainly to the question of the province and duties of Trustees, and contended that "the views on this subject held and acted upon by the ex-communicated Trustees were just and correct, and that the First church was clearly in the wrong in that matter"—that to deny this was to confound things spiritual and secular, and a departure from the acknowledged doctrines of Baptist churches. At a later stage of the proceedings, Judge Harris was requested to give his views on this subject through the press, and he engaged to do so. The resolution of advice to the Tabernacle church was carried by a vote of 45 to 16. The Council voted to publish their proceedings, and adjourned sine die.

RETRIBUTION.—When Admiral Coligny was assassinated at midnight of St. Bartholomew's day, and thrown out of his window upon the pavement, Henry Duke de Guise, to be assured of his death, wiped the blood from his face with his handkerchief, and said, "I know him, it is he;" and then giving the dead body a kick, rushed on to extend the carnage. Sixteen years after, this same Henry de Guise lay dead before Henry III., who also gave him a kick in the face.

Never be influenced by external appearances in forming your judgment of a person's worth. This is an important rule; for many a noble spirit is covered by the habiliments of poverty; while, not unfrequently, a showy exterior conceals a villain.

REMINISCENCES OF A MISSIONARY.

A missionary writes to the New York Evangelist and gives some interesting recollections of his experience in first engaging in his work. The account which follows is instructive, showing as it does, that it is safe to follow duty and leave results with God:

In the spring of 1831 a youthful party had assembled to spend the evening at the house of a venerable professor. Mirth had passed its bonds, and midnight found the young hearts reveling in social gayety. E. loved the Saviour, and for some time had sat in silence—his face concealed by his hand. I rallied him for his stupidity. He drew me to his side. I was impenitent, but the strongest friendship existed between us. With tenderness he inquired, "Am I the guilty murderer of your soul?" I had previously wept in his presence as he spoke to me of Christ. I mingled again with the mirthful band, but he rose not from his seat until the party dispersed. Returning home that night my horse ran of fright, and though he kept the road, passed directly over a creature that lay in his way. We were three persons in the carriage, and it seemed a miracle that we escaped unhurt. Peace deserted me until Christ took possession of my soul.

I read the memoir of S. J. Mills, and though I dreaded the trials, I longed for the work of a missionary. With the advice of friends I commenced study for the ministry, but poverty drove me to teaching; and while thus engaged, I was solicited to go as a teacher for the American Board to the Indians. All but my father counseled me to go. He was silent, and when I received my appointment his heart revolted. He was poor, and sickness had made havoc with his health and property. His hopes were living in me, and as my preparation to leave advanced, they died before his eyes. For three days he could neither see nor speak to me. The night previous to my departure, knowing that he was in his room, I entered and spoke to him, but he could not answer. What could I do? I had received and expended the money for my outfit. How could I retreat? How could I go forward without his consent—nay, without his blessing? She that bore and nourished me said, "Be patient, God will make your duty plain."

The next day I found in my chamber a letter from my father, written with the emphasis of despair, consenting to my departure, but urging me to return in five years and take care of my mother, as his suffering body would long ere that rest in the grave. He placed my trunk upon the stage with his own hands, and with an earnest 'God speed and protect you,' bade me farewell. The cloud of despair on his features had given place to a smile of calm submission. Night and a storm were gathering over the scenes of my youth as I departed, but oh! the light and peace that burned on that altar where parental piety had, scarce knowing what it did, consecrated me again and again to the service of God.

My father changed his residence in consequence of my departure, and passed from a state of moral inactivity into one of decided usefulness. He became a leading member in society, an elder in the church, a superintendent in the Sabbath-School, his property nearly doubled in value, and ten years afterwards his body, instead of resting in the grave, had not been prostrated a day by disease, but was bearing an honored and hoary head in the way of righteousness. In assisting a child, to whom he had looked for comfort, he had fallen in debt. I had left the service of the Board and was teaching for the government, with a support that our missionaries never receive, and tendered him aid. With joy he received it, but though I labored three years to relieve him, his sickness and misfortunes swallowed without benefit all I did. I then, from conscientious motives, resigned my charge, since which neither sickness or misfortunes have interrupted him.

A THANKSGIVING INCIDENT.

It is three years since early one morning, we stepped into a store on Fore street, and found there a sailor hastily bargaining for a few necessary articles. His ship was upon the point of sailing, and he had not a moment to spare. But the store-keeper could not change the bill presented, and both were in perplexity. At this moment, a plain, and evidently hard-working man, who had been a spectator, stepped up and exclaimed, "Never mind, Jack, I'll pay the score, so hurry off, or you'll lose your ship." Jack looked hesitatingly at the man, exclaimed, "Thank you, sir," and was gone. We were pleased at the occurrence, and it dwelt pleasantly in our minds for many days. But time wears away the solid stone, and so the memory of the sailor and his friend had passed away from us. We were again in the same store, and it was the day before Thanksgiving. There were many present, but one came slowly and sadly in. He was evidently a poor man, and he whispered anxiously to the store-keeper, and we caught the word "credit." The store keeper shook his head. The poor man was turning away, when a rough voice saluted him—"Avast there a bit, I have seen you before!" We looked, and memory came slowly to our aid. It was the sailor. We looked again, and saw in the poor man, he who had so readily paid his bill. The sailor had by this time grasped the poor man's hand, and was astonishing him with an outpouring of gratitude, garnished with oaths, the upshot of which was that "Shiver his timbers if he'd see him want while he had a shot in the locker." And he was as good as his word, for the poor man departed well laden with good things for the coming morrow. And so here was a fitting afterpart to the little incident of three years before.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

The article of "J. N. B.," which we publish this week, is excellent. We commend it to the careful perusal of our readers. The Apologue, with which he closes, is a beautiful illustration of the perfect harmony of the Gospel with the Law. To subvert the Law—to invalidate a single one of its precepts—to remove "one jot or one tittle" from it, was no part of our Saviour's mission. The Law is the standard of duty; the Gospel is the power by which the heart is brought into conformity to the standard. The soul renewed by the Gospel says, "O how love I thy law," and from henceforth strives with might to keep every one of its precepts. We do not believe that one new born into the kingdom of heaven, would feel any disposition to set aside that precept of the law, which enjoins a season of rest and communion with God. In the "love of his espousals," the Sabbath is esteemed by him "a delight." It is only after having left his "first love," that he begins to doubt its claims to sanctification, and weaves out that specious web of sophistry which sets its authority aside altogether.

We are exceedingly happy that we can give the article of "J. N. B." such unqualified approbation. We have no particular strictures to offer this week.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS IN WISCONSIN.

The Legislature of this flourishing member of our great Republic has recently enacted the following law:—

AN ACT for the relief of those persons commonly called Seventh-day Baptists, and others who keep the seventh day of the week as a day of rest.

The People of the State of Wisconsin, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Whenever civil process shall be issued by a Justice of the Peace against any person who habitually observes and keeps the seventh day of the week instead of the first as a day of rest, and such process shall be returnable on the seventh day of the week, known as Saturday, such defendant shall be entitled to have the cause continued to the following Monday at the same hour, by filing with such Justice, one day before the return of the writ, an affidavit in writing, stating that he or she (as the case may be) habitually keeps and observes the seventh day of the week instead of the first as a day of rest, and such defendant shall be entitled to all his rights on such adjourned day, the same as if it were the return day of such writ, provided that the costs of such continuance shall be paid by the plaintiff in such writ.

F. W. HORN, Speaker of the Assembly.
S. W. BEALL, Lt. Gov. and Pres. Senate.
Approved, March 15, 1851.
NELSON DEWEY.

Upon this the N. Y. Daily Express holds the following language:—

THE SABBATH DAY.—The people of Wisconsin passed a law, in March last, which relieves the sect known as the Seventh-day Baptists, from the usual legal liabilities on Saturday. The processes which bear upon them are made returnable on Monday. We suppose the observance of the one National Sabbath at least to fall within the spirit of the Divine command. What is now known as the Sabbath has been so known for a long, long course of years, and in almost all countries. It is now eight hundred and ninety-one years since our present Sunday was ordered to be kept holy in England. In the reign of James, the ideas of the Sabbath, were so strict that, by an act of Parliament, one shilling per head was levied upon all church absentees during Sunday. In the reign of Charles I. amusements were suspended on that day, and in the reign of Chas. II. (1677) an act was passed forbidding all servile work, all sale of goods, and everything except meat in public houses, and all works except those of charity or necessity, on a penalty of five shillings for each offense.

The Jews commemorated the Sabbath not only as an ordinance of God, in remembrance of the Creation, but also of their redemption from the bondage of the Egyptians. The Jews call the seventh day their Sabbath, and they maintain that it was never abrogated or superseded, and is founded on Divine authority.

The Christians celebrate our Sabbath—the Sabbath of our country and of our ancestors, English, Dutch, and all, in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ from the dead, and the universal resurrection of the whole family of man.

We are not about to enter upon the discussion whether the Jews or Christians are right. It is enough to know that one day, and that associated with the resurrection of Christ, the greatest of all events in the history of the religious world, has been set apart for worship and for rest. The Seventh-day Baptists claim to be more alive to old rites and recorded duties than the rest of mankind. They ask peculiar legislation in their behalf—a sort of new dispensation for their special benefit. To grant such petitions may not only now lead to the embarrassment of others, but perhaps to an interference with their conscientious scruples touching the observance of some other day in the week as the true Sabbath, or fall upon some other day as one peculiarly sacred and holy. By and by Legislatures may be called upon to grant exemptions for every society in the calendar of sects. There are, according to Balbi, 225,000,000 of Christians, so called, all believers in the Christian Sabbath. There are 155,000,000 of Mahomedans, all, we believe, making Friday their Sabbath. There are 4,500,000 Jews, besides a few Christians, who, like the sect in Wisconsin, maintain that Saturday is the true Sabbath. And there are 665,000,000 unbelievers in Christ, Judaism, or Mahomet, who either hold all days alike, or no one particular day worthy of Christian, Jewish, or other remembrance.

We cling, therefore, to our own Sabbath, and desire to see no innovations upon it; neither the recognition of other Sabbaths by legislative enactment, nor anything calculated to draw off attention from or diminish respect towards the Sabbath of our fathers and their fathers, and from the Sabbath day of our people now, and, as we hope, in its most holy observances, the Sabbath of the nation for all time to come.

Remarks.

The Seventh-day Baptists do indeed "ask peculiar legislation in their behalf," or—as the Express otherwise tauntingly expresses it—"a sort of new dispensation for their special benefit." But they ask it, not—as covertly insinuated—that they may have any advantage over their fellow citizens, but that they may stand on an equality with them. Other denominations who observe the first day of the week have already been favored with "peculiar legislation in their behalf," and Seventh-day Baptists can see no good reason why their own consciences should not be guarded as safely as those of their neighbors. They never could understand, why those constitutional pledges of our national and state governments, which guaranty to every citizen the full and free enjoyment of such form of religion as may be most agreeable to the dictates of his own judgment, and security from being compelled by law to patronize or support any system of religious belief whatever, should always be construed for the special benefit of those who keep holy the Sunday. 'It is a poor rule that won't work both ways,' they think; and so they take it upon themselves to remind our law-makers, that if they will shape their laws so that those who have conscience with regard to Sunday can receive the benefit of them, justice, equality, and every principle of republicanism, require that they should make another set of laws, so that those who have conscience with regard to the seventh day can in like manner be benefited. As things now stand, in most of the States we are an oppressed people. In those in which we are most favored, we are prohibited from performing common labor on the first day of the week, except under restrictions shamefully destructive of the great principle of equal rights. In the State of New Jersey, for instance, a Seventh-day Baptist may work quietly on his farm, provided he is very still about it, and makes no noise which an ill-natured neighbor can construe into a disturbance of his peace; but wo be to him, if he attempts to cart a load of hay through the streets. Other people may go to the salt-marsh, and take home their hay on Saturday, passing directly through a community of our own, and nobody can molest them. But if a Seventh-day Baptist does the same thing on Sunday with impunity, he does it through the forbearance of his neighbors, and not because the law protects him. In the little village of Shiloh, in that State, and for a mile or two round, the people are almost exclusively the adherents of our faith. If one of them should find it for his interest to go to Bridgeton, and start a steam saw-mill, or some other establishment of like nature, and keep it going on Sunday, the offended citizens might complain of it as a disturbance, and oblige the owner to suspend its operations on that day. But a citizen of Bridgeton might start a noisy factory under the very eaves of the Shiloh meeting-house, and keep it in operation every Sabbath day with perfect impunity. In many of the States, however, it is a violation of the law for our people to work at all on Sunday. Even in their own shops, and on their own farms, they are not protected; and whoever chooses to be base enough to inform against them, can be their persecutor. They may be made to do military duty on the seventh day, or pay their fine; they may be compelled to serve as jurors, and can be excused only by the courtesy of the judge, not of right; they may be subjected to legal process on the Sabbath, and they have no redress; and all this in a country, whose institutions profess to be based upon equal rights. Of such things Seventh-day Baptists complain; and they intend to complain, till the increase of light shall have shamed legislators into the enacting of such laws as shall be more in accordance with the true principles of our republican government. In the mean time, they thank God and take courage in view of what has been accomplished in Wisconsin.

We know how often it has been said, that we are a very small minority, and that the will of the majority must govern in such cases. But we know also, that the majority long ago settled it as a principle of our government, that the full and free enjoyment of such form of religion as might be most agreeable to every man's conscience, should not be prohibited, nor in any way restrained by oppressive legislation. This was the Constitutional guaranty of our national government. The same provision, substantially, enters into every one of our State Constitutions. And what, in the name of sense, are Constitutions for, unless to secure the rights of minorities? If we may believe and practice nothing but what the multitude allows, in what respect are we better off than those who live under a monarchy or a despotism? If we know any thing about government, Constitutions were ordained to shield minorities from the oppression of majorities. That government is truly American, and (we may add) truly divine, which affords the best protection to the weak. The strong can take care of themselves.

The historical facts, in which the Express deals, have nothing to do with the merits of the question. They are introduced more for effect than any thing else, and do not necessarily require notice. We would remark, however, that it is so far from being true, that "what is now known as the Sabbath has been so known for a long, long course of years, and in almost all countries," that it is only about two hundred and fifty years since the doctrine which founds the obligation to keep Sunday upon the fourth commandment was first broached. And even now its sabbatic character is recognized nowhere but in Great Britain and the United States. Yet the Express would have us believe, that as long ago as the time of Alfred the Great, it was recognized as the Sabbath of the Lord. As a religious festival it has been in use from a very early period. But the first man that proclaimed its sabbatic character, and rested its claims upon the divine law, was Dr. Nicholas Bound, of Norton, in the county of Suffolk, England, who, in 1595, published a book entitled "Sabbathum Veteri et Novi Testamenti; or, The True Doctrine of the Sabbath." The Puritans, who were then creating considerable sensation, all fell in with this doctrine, and lent their utmost influence to spread it through the kingdom. Before this, no one ever attempted to found its right on the Scriptures, any more than they did that of other days which were usually associated with it, and which were acknowledged on all hands to have derived their sacred character solely from the Church. And however true it is, that the Sunday was ordered to be kept holy in England eight hundred and ninety-one years ago, it is equally true, that the same order was extended to the other days that were observed by the Church as fasts or feasts. If any one of these fasts or feasts was weekly, there was no difference whatever in the sanctification between it and Sunday.

The Express tells us what strict ideas of the Sabbath prevailed in the reign of James, but says nothing about the celebrated "Book of Sports," published by his order, and republished by his son Charles the First, in which was set forth the royal pleasure, "that after the end of divine service his good people should not be disturbed, letted, or discouraged from any lawful recreations, such as dancing, either of men or women, archerie for men, leaping or vaulting, or any such harmless recreations; nor from having May-games, whitsun-ales, or novice-dances, and setting up of May-poles, or other sports therewith used; so as the same be had in due and convenient times, without impediment or let of divine service." The fact is, there was no other sacredness attached to the Sunday than there was to all other days acknowledged as holy by the Church of Rome. The decrees of James and Charles were nothing more than a repetition of what had already been done by their predecessors, under whom "Sunday and many holy days, the feasts of all Saints, of holy Innocents, were established as festivals by law." We are compelled, therefore, to regard this attempt of the Express to impose upon its readers the belief that Sunday has always, and in every place, been recognized as the Sabbath, as one of those "pious frauds," by which the advocates of this festival have in every age endeavored to get it enshrined as sacred in the hearts of the people.

We think the Act of the Wisconsin Legislature a good "precedent." We hail it as one of the favorable signs of the times—a sign of progress—a sign that there are some in our land who acknowledge the principle of equal rights, and have justice enough to apply it.

OUR SHORT-SIGHTEDNESS EXPOSED.

The Sabbath Discussion and the Sabbath Recorder.

We have been quite amused at the course of this paper in reference to the discussion on the Sabbath, that has been going on in the Chronicle for some time past. The Sabbath Recorder is a respectable sheet, published in New York, for the purpose of defending the seventh day, as the true legitimate Sabbath. It meets with many opposers both in faith and practice, and when the discussion was started between "J. N. B." and "Exodus," it threw its sails to the wind, and exulted in view of glorious times as just ahead, not only that this subject was to be investigated, but that it was to be published in a paper which did not sympathize with the Recorder in this particular. Its congratulations were loud and long. "Exodus" was received with open arms, and its cause was considered as in the hands of a GOLIATH. It triumphantly exclaimed, this whole discussion will be transferred to my pages, and the public shall know full well the great argument. It exultingly commenced the work, and when we stated that the discussion would close within such a time and space, it seemed to be in tears and deplore exceedingly such a verdict. It was regarded as a verdict based on bigotry and sectarianism, and a fear that the truth would be told. When at the special plea of the parties at issue, it was to continue for a season, its joy was inexpressible. But the merits of the discussion did not at first appear, and so the Recorder was caught in own trap. "J. N. B." was for the first day as the Sabbath, the Recorder for the seventh day for the Sabbath, and "Exodus" was for neither! The Recorder first sympathized with "Exodus," and boastingly published his bold arguments. But soon finding "Exodus" was driving with his calm might against everything in the shape of a Sabbath, it set itself on the defensive against him, and resorted to every plea for support against his thrusts and blows to overthrow the seventh day as the Sabbath. After bracing up for a while against him as he grew warmer and warmer, it dropped the discussion altogether, and fairly backed out of the whole affair, leaving the illiberal, bigoted, and timid Chronicle, to go through with it all alone! "Exodus" was first congratulated, then embraced, then repulsed from its arms, and finally turned out of doors by this very hospitable host. We truly sympathize with "Exodus" at such treatment, pity the Recorder at such stings from its supposed friend, and congratulate the Chronicle that it has withstood the shock, and still holds on the even tenor of its way, yet proclaiming the doctrine of free discussion! We would, however, advise the Recorder to beware of its friends in future, and not speak till it first knows to whom it is speaking, and about what it is speaking. It is a little mortifying to set a snare for others, and fall into it ourselves!

The foregoing specimen of verdancy we clip from the Christian Chronicle of April 23d. We give it to our readers, that they may have something to laugh at. Not that we have any desire to hold up the author of it to ridicule, but because we wish to be a recorder of the odd vagaries and strange conceits to which the agitation of the Sabbath question gives rise, for the instruction of future generations. We shall not, of course, saddle the authorship of the piece upon the responsible editor of the Chronicle, for we cannot believe that one who writes so creditably upon ordinary subjects could descend to such puerility upon this. It is, probably, the production of a beginner in editorial tactics, who feels somewhat chafed by the discussion, and wishes to administer to us a castigation, which he is not yet quite competent to undertake. He will doubtless improve in this line, however, and when he becomes more accustomed to shaking the rod, so as to conceal the tremor of his hand with better skill, it may be that we shall writhe under his blows rather more than we do at present. We only wonder that the Chronicle admitted the article without subjecting it to a closer scrutiny. But Jove himself sometimes nods.

The insinuation that we at first supposed "Exodus" to be an advocate of our cause, is so perfectly ludicrous, that we are almost tempted to think that it was a slip of the pen. It is barely possible that some of the Chronicle's subscribers may be hoodwinked into the notion that we were thus duped. But we can assure them, that we are not quite so unitiated into the various mysteries of this question. The era of our conversion to the Bible Sabbath—some twelve years ago—was marked by encounters with anti-sabbatarianism; and, from that time, its various phases have been our diligent study. We flatter ourselves that we have become so well acquainted with it, that it must come under very skillful disguise if we do not discern its approach at the outset. No, no, brother Chronicle, you must try some other ruse, if you wish to neutralize our influence. That "Exodus" "was driving with his calm might against everything in the shape of a Sabbath," we knew full well at the outset; and the endeavor to create the impression that we suffered disappointment afterwards, and "resorted to every plea for support against his threats and blows," and at last "fairly backed out of the whole affair," is too foolishly false for farther notice. We did rejoice in the commencement of the discussion, and rejoice in it still. Not that we can subscribe the propositions of either party, but we hope that the agitation of the subject will open the eyes of some of our Pennsylvania friends to see that it is one which is not generally understood. If they can once be made to see this, they may be the better prepared to give a candid hearing to views which are more in accordance with truth than those of either "Exodus" or "J. N. B."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 36.

Mesmerism, Electro-Biology, &c.

GLASGOW, April 18th, 1851.

Mesmerism, Electro-biology, and other forms of interference with the human will, and dealing with spiritual agencies, are finding favor with many whose professions might be expected to excite caution. Dr. Gregory, of Edinburgh, has delivered two public lectures in commendation, in that city—the meetings having been presided over by a clergyman of the Free Church, to which denomination, I think, Dr. G. himself belongs. Dr. Darling has now published a book on the subject; and at one of his performances in this city, a letter was read from the Earl of Eglinton, stating that his Grace had performed greater Electro-biologic wonders than any of those done in public by Dr. D.; and we do not doubt that many here are in private having recourse to the same thing. But while there may be no difficulty in the way of doing so, it is much to be regretted that there is so little solicitude evinced to ascertain whether men ought to take part in such things. There was no difficulty to prevent Eve from taking the fruit, the eating of which God had forbid. She was even pressed to do as she did, and was led to believe that much advantage would result from it. The legality of what is proposed, is of more consequence than the ease with which it can be performed.

The denunciations in Scripture as to dealings with spiritual agencies do not imply that there is an impossibility on the part of any to commit the sin. Witchcraft is by the Apostle Paul classed among "the works of the flesh;" and the Canaanites, who were destroyed for this among other sins, seem to have found no difficulty in committing it. It is true, that many practices have in modern times been associated with the name of witchcraft, which may have had no connection with it; but the sin itself may not be less practicable than other "works of the devil." The divine denunciations of the Canaanites (Deut. xviii. 9—14,) plainly imply, not only that the forms of divination were various, but that these were extensively practiced among them. It is very doubtful whether any clear conception can be formed of the import of some of the terms there used in the original Hebrew, or whether we are much helped to this by the English words employed in translation. Yet all of them are prohibited in much the same way as theft, or murder, or Sabbath-breaking. The evils are spoken of, too, as realities, not pretenses. It is a crime distinct from imposture, yet not less really a crime. Dr. S. R. Maitland, in his Illustrations and Enquiries relating to Mesmerism, has been at pains to trace out the meaning of the consulting with familiar spirits; and remarks, that the original has nothing corresponding either to our English words "spirit" and "familiar," or giving countenance to the ideas commonly associated with these terms. It means simply one that asks Aub. The Septuagint generally renders by a word signifying one whose mythos was gastric, or some how connected with the stomach; and, as the Doctor remarks, those who have any knowledge of the subject know that the stomach occupies an important position in Mesmerism, and in the mythic performances of clairvoyant patients. In this respect, some of them are true "ventriloquists"—for those who take that name in the present day do not speak from the stomach, while the mesmeric statements in regard to many of their patients are, in this respect, quite remarkable.

It is true, that the Septuagint is only a translation, and sometimes renders the original incorrectly, and even in this case quoted has used a word which does not express the meaning of one that asks Aub. But at the period at which they wrote they may have known that the meaning of the phrase was expressed by a word which pointed to the practices of those who spoke by the stomach. And while they have in general given this translation, Dr. M. shows that in 2 Kings xxi. 6; xxiii. 24, where the same Hebrew words occur, they have rendered differently, and in the latter of these texts, they in Greek express that Josiah "put away the willers." In this word we have a perfectly correct appellation for Dr. Darling and all Electro-biologists, as also of many of the Mesmerists, who have not assumed this name having so much the air of "science, falsely so called." But "the willers" seems to express the meaning of the Hebrew Aub, which is a noun derived from the verb signifying to will. And this, again, Dr. M. connects with the fact that in Col. ii. 18, which in our translation reads, "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility," the word voluntary refers to the will of the beguiler, and not that of the beguiled, and would therefore be better understood if translated, "Let no man beguile you willing."

It need not surprise us if we are thus led to believe that at Collosse, in the days of the Apostle, sins were indulged akin to or identical with those for which destruction came upon the ancient Canaanites; but it is grieving to think that Christian men and women, in the present day, including even a number of ministers of the Gospel, may be tampering with the evil, and in all danger from it. If Satan do sometimes assume the character of an angel of light, and give promises of great good, it will be that it may issue in greater evil; it may indeed be a different kind. Miss Martineau, who believed herself to be cured of disease by the agency of Mesmerism, and who afterwards boasted that, by the same means, she cured her sick cow, and who supposes that she has made thereby great discoveries of "the Laws of Man's Nature," seems to have become a perfect Atheist. If so, has Satan lost by her Mesmeric cure? Or is the gain she has got a thing to be desired by any, if at the hazard of such expense? That Saul went and consulted a Mistress of Aub, when the Lord refused to answer him, is one of the reasons divinely assigned even for his death. As such evils prevail, it becomes the Christian to be doubly careful in standing apart from what has even the appearance of evil, until he satisfies himself that it is not evil in reality also.

J. A. BEGG.

A CLERICAL FUGITIVE.—Several months ago we chronicled the fact that the University of Heidelberg had conferred the title of Doctor of Divinity upon the Rev. Mr. Pennington, pastor of a colored Presbyterian Church in New York City. Mr. Pennington was at the time traveling in Europe, and since the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law, he declines to return. The Independent gives the following account of his relation to slavery:—

"He is a fugitive slave. If we are rightly informed, he escaped from his master when the latter had brought him to the north as a traveling servant. Since then, he has lived at the north unmolested, openly preaching the Gospel of Christ. An attempt was once made by some friends in Connecticut to purchase his freedom, which failed, either because the sum offered was not deemed sufficient, or rather, as our informant supposes, because his master refused to sell him on any terms, but avowed his purpose to get him back into bondage as a punishment for his ungrateful desertion. Until the passage of the late law, there was no hope of this; but now Dr. P. could be seized in his very pulpit, and even while ministering at the table of the Lord; or, perhaps, while sitting as moderator of the third presbytery of New York, dragged before a commissioner, and remanded to his 'owner,' to be put up at auction in a southern mart, or worked under the lash, far away from wife and family, from church and Christian friends, perhaps denied even to read the word God."

"ANNIVERSARY WEEK."—The Anniversaries of several of the large benevolent and reformatory societies occur in New York during the present week. In our next we shall endeavor to present the leading facts of general interest which are reported.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 9.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

Take off the Captain—New Difficulties—The Roncador—Quitta Suano—Discover a Wreck—Efforts for the relief of those on board.

We were now free from immediate danger, but what course to pursue we knew not. We were at sea, with the Mate in command, and he was totally incompetent to the responsibility which devolved upon him. It seemed to be the prevailing sentiment, that if the Mate failed to get the Captain on board within a reasonable time, it was due to ourselves to depose him, put one of the seaman passengers in command, and proceed to the nearest port where a survey of the vessel could be had. Our uneasiness was increased by the fact that the sand which had been placed in the hold for ballast had choked the pumps, or it was supposed so, for they would not work; and the water, accumulating beneath the floor in the hold, where about forty passengers were confined, washed the sand up through every crevice. If any thing could add to our discomfort, it was the fact that there were but two seamen of the crew fit for duty.

The Mate evinced the greatest perplexity. As soon as we were clear of the land, he brought the chart down into the cabin, and, calling for a pair of dividers, began to make some jagged pencil lines with a trembling hand, but for what purpose, or what he could possibly want of the chart, no one of the persons present could conceive. At length he asked Capt. Titcomb what he should do, and expressed a wish to stand off on the starboard tack till midnight, then on three hours, and off four, till the wind should abate. Capt. T.'s advice was to go about immediately, before we should lose sight of the island; (for, having no chronometer on board, he doubted whether in such case he would be able to find it again;) get as near the anchorage as was safe, and if we could not pick up the men, then to make short tacks until it was possible. This advice he followed, and stood about for the island. As we neared it, he could not tell where he left the boat, and was again under the necessity of asking advice from the passengers. Before night the Captain and boat were picked up, and we laid our course around the south end of the island, stearing S. E. by E. to clear the S. E. Keys, a dangerous reef twenty miles from St. Andrews. There was reported to be a bad reef extending to the northward for many miles, and the charts could not be depended upon. (Owen's Surveys were not on board, nor did the Captain know that there were such charts.) The wind was now favorable for running to windward, but this imaginary obstacle compelled us to run off.

It really seemed that home grew farther off with each day's efforts to get there. Just three months had elapsed since I left Sacramento, with an eager, light heart, hoping to be soon at an end of all my adventures and hardships; but disappointment and long delays had fairly reduced our hope to apathy, and home seemed like some vision of our childhood, every day more unreal and uncertain. It was the general opinion of the seamen on board, that there is no navigation more difficult or dangerous than that on this coast. The coral reefs and banks which intersperse it, and which are so low as not to be discoverable until one is upon them—the current, which accompanies the trade-winds, and which renders all calculations uncertain—the discrepancy in charts, and the necessity of beating up for a vessel bound north from San Juan—are circumstances of which we were not ignorant, any more than of the entire unseaworthiness of our brig and crew. There was such a want of confidence in the officers on the part of the three ex-captains on board, that there was not an hour of the night that some one of them was not on watch, and it was from their vigilance, more than from any particular good luck, that we ever reached home. There was generally more concern among the officers to get their meals before the passengers, and secure the choicest bits, than for the safety of the vessel or the lives of those on board. So careful was Captain Lawrence that all of his officers should eat before the passengers, that the deck was habitually left without an officer during meal time.

On the night of January 6th, the officer of the watch reported smooth water, and the noise of many birds, such as are not heard far from land; and it was supposed that we had passed close under the lee of the Roncador reef, where the brig Metamoras was reported at St. Andrews to have been wrecked about two weeks before. If this were the case, we should be able to make Serrana before night, as it was only forty-five miles N. by W. The wind was now blowing from the old quarter, and we were running to the westward of north. About an hour after sunrise Capt. T., who was, notwithstanding his age, the sharpest sighted of us all, discovered breakers under our lee, and the Captain was informed of it. He continued to run on for some time, when a sail was discovered about two points on our weather bow. She had all sail set, and was apparently bound the same way with ourselves. The breakers were now seen broad off our beam, and extending in a long white line far to the north and south. The order was given to go about, for we were almost in the jaws of our worst enemy. This was "Quitta Suano," ("Banish Sleep,") a reef extending about twenty-five miles, with a strong current setting across it from the eastward, and having no land above water to afford a footing to those who are cast upon it. Serrana, the easternmost limit of our route, was about twenty-five miles to the windward. That day and the ensuing night were spent in beating off, and the next morning, when it was supposed that we were in the longitude of that reef, we stood nearly north.

About eight o'clock a sail was seen off our lee bow; and soon after it was discovered that she was in distress, having lost her foremast, and her colors were set on the mizen, union down. One of the men from the wreck of the Union went aloft to determine whether it was not that vessel, but returned immediately, not recognizing her, and reported breakers all about her. We ran on until she was off our beam, when the seas could be seen making completely over her, and by the help of a glass we discovered a man climbing the shrouds. It was now thought that this was the same vessel that we saw the day before, and that she was on the Quitta Suano. The Captain determined at once to do something for their relief, and Capt. Hutchinson stated publicly, that as his crew were on land, well provided with stores for six months, and these men must perish soon unless aid could reach them, he would relinquish his charter, and it was a unanimous resolution, on the part of the passengers, to share their last biscuit with them rather than leave them to perish. The only mode of reaching them would be to get to the leeward, where the bank or shore extends about twelve miles wide. This is of coral, which frequently rises to the surface, sometimes in reefs, and at others in isolated rocks. So we squared away, ran around the south end of the reef, and worked our way amongst the rocks as far as it was possible toward the wreck. We dropped our anchor in ten fathoms of water, and the brig lay in fine corals, projecting themselves to the surface on every side. The water was so clear that the bottom could be seen at the depth of ten fathoms, and fish could be distinguished in great numbers feeding upon the coral. We were still twelve miles from the wreck, and it was now four o'clock P. M., and too late to attempt any thing that day, farther than to make preparations for the next morning.

That night was a strange one. We no longer heard the dash nor felt the heave of the sea about us, but the distant, sullen roar of breakers. Our little wandering hag of a vessel was anchored, as if asleep, far from land, or shelter from the gales that sometimes sweep the ocean. Our only anchor was in the coral beds, and we dreaded to think what our fate must be should we be driven from our anchorage at night by such a wind as that we had encountered but a few days before. But what concerned us most was the scarcity of provisions, which might yet compel us to put back. All the fishing tackle on board was put in requisition to contribute to the supply, and many small fish were caught.

It was eight o'clock the next morning before the boats were ready to be launched, and then one was discovered coming down from the wreck, with a blanket raised for a sail. This contained the Mate and two men of the Martha Sanger, from Chagres, bound to New Orleans, with 90 passengers, requesting assistance. The jolly-boat was put under the command of Capt. Hutchinson, and the long-boat under the Mate, who was ex-officio in command of all the boats. All the able seamen were sent with them. The wind was fresh, and the long-boat, which is generally the poorest sea-boat that is built, being unable to make head against it, was compelled to make fast to the coral. The two small boats succeeded in reaching the wreck, but that of Capt. H., which was the smallest, was with great difficulty kept from swamping, and he was unable to do more than concert a plan of operations, and encourage the men, who were terror-stricken. The boat belonging to the wreck, having wash-boards temporarily fastened around it, came off with the master (Robinson,) mate, and the captain's large sea-chest, containing his own valuables, with as much gold-dust as he could induce the men on board to trust to his keeping, leaving all his passengers to the uncertainty of another night. A keg containing spirits, and a fur robe, which Capt. Robinson had taken from an infirm old man, one of his passengers, were hoisted on deck, and good spirits prevailed that night among the ward-room officers. Never did I witness, even in the scenes of the Valley of the Sacramento, such a total recklessness of responsibility and disregard of human life. Capt. Robinson thought himself on Serrana, and would not be convinced to the contrary. The current had carried him further to the westward than his reckoning made him.

The next morning the three boats were connected by means of a line, so as to assist the long-boat in getting up to the reef. There was difficulty in getting men to man the boats. Capt. Robinson had promised his passengers that he would return this morning to their assistance; but he hired a substitute, and remained with the brig. I volunteered to go with Capt. Hutchinson, as the only man in whose courage and prudence I had any confidence. His boat pulled but two oars, and we started off with enthusiasm. It was about 8 o'clock, and we wished to gain the reef directly to windward before the breeze freshened in the afternoon. The distance was only about five miles, but the utmost exertion was requisite to stem the current, wind, and waves. We got near enough to make fast to some coral, a few feet beneath the surface, by means of a small pinnace gun, with a painter attached, when we encountered a heavy squall and rain; but the boats were so arranged that one broke the force of the wind from the other two, and when its violence had abated we pulled in closer to the reef, where the sea was smoother.

It is rarely that one has a better opportunity to see those marine forests than was furnished me that day. Divesting one's self of the idea of danger—if possible, while floating between two submerged hills, from whose crests the sea firs wave and trees of white coral project their flinty boughs, teeming with many-colored life—he might almost see the Nereids sporting in the groves. Sponges and plants take root in the shelly bottom, and look green as our woods on terra firma. Fish of the most gorgeous colors, and shells, you will see; and even a branch of the coral which you raise is covered with the lower forms of animal life. In fact, the whole is one animated mass. But to the sailor these are full of horror; he sees those corals, like dead men's fingers, pointing from the grave, and threatening the thin cedar boards that separate the world above from that beneath the waters; and the daughters of Nereus he knows in the character of sharks.

We followed along the thundering line of seas, whose huge crests protected us from the wind, pulling "hard starboard" or "hard larboard," to clear some lurking rock, till the middle of the afternoon, when we were close upon the wreck. The most difficult part to be accomplished was to get through the reef and surf to the vessel. At low tide the points of rock on the reef project a few inches above water, with race-ways or water-worn channels; and as the sea breaks and rushes in tumultuous foam over the rocks, it flows through these channels. Through these a boat must pass, and Capt. H., who had cast off from the long-boat, told us to pull steady and strong, on no account to look around us, but to keep our eyes steadily on the oar; and we pulled as though our lives depended on each stroke. We entered the channel under the lee of the wreck, and slowly gained upon the foaming torrent. Our oars on both sides touched the rock, and placing them against this firmer fulcrum, we forced ourselves through. A few more strokes carried us over the turbulent heaving mass of foam between it and the wreck, when my strength entirely failed, and I had not the power to grasp the rope that hung over the side. A small raft had been made of the masts and spars that had fallen overboard, and empty casks were bound to it. This was surging against the vessel's side with every wave, alternately underneath and uppermost the sea. From this I was lifted on board, and repaired to the quarter-deck.

The Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews.—The Anniversary of this Society was held in a Reformed Dutch Church in New York, on Thursday evening, April 24. Rev. Dr. Bailey, of Troy, preached the annual sermon. The Report states that one hundred Jews have been converted during the past year. It was also stated, that there are at present 100,000 Jews in this country, and large numbers of Jewish immigrants are continually arriving. The Society has six missionaries, and a large number of agents and minor officers. The receipts for the last year were $11,163 02, and the expenditures $11,099 04, leaving a small balance in the treasury. The receipts of the last year exceeded those of the preceding year by $5,000.

A Church Struck by Lightning.—At Danville, Pa., on Sunday afternoon, April 27, during the service in the Methodist church, and while the congregation were at prayer before the communion, the church was struck by lightning—the fluid passed down the steeple and lamp rods into the center of the church, amid the assemblage, instantly killing Mrs. George Pensyl, and seriously injuring several others in different parts of the house. The steeple was shattered, pews destroyed, and flooring torn up. The church was new and has sustained considerable injury. What use will the collectors of "Sunday Accidents" make of this?

Board of National Education.—A letter dated at Cleveland, Ohio, says that the Board of National Popular Education, of which Gov. Slade is Agent, has its principal officers in that city. It has already sent two hundred female teachers to the great West, and the call is still for more. Hitherto the classes have received a preparatory course at Hartford, Conn., but this year they have been gathered under the care of Miss B. Guilford, at Cleveland. Some twenty-five in number (the present class) leave in a few days for their various fields of labor, and their molding influence upon a portion of the children of the Western World will be felt, we doubt not, for good. Gov. Slade expects to make Cleveland his future residence.

Fugitive Slaves fleeing to Canada.—The Springfield Republican says that all or nearly all of the Fugitive Slaves residing in that place have gone to Canada, many of them within a few days past. This is undoubtedly the happiest course; it relieves them from the apprehension of reclamation, whose continual presence is worse than Slavery itself; and although in many cases it is to the serious sacrifice of pecuniary and social advantages, the feeling of security and independence which a transfer from the Republic of America to the Provinces of a Kingly power gives them, must prove more than a full compensation. In some instances, the fugitives better their pecuniary condition by the change. We hear of one who lately went from Springfield, to whom his freedom would be no inducement to return, he having purchased a little farm, and engaged successfully in its cultivation.

A Curiosity.—While Governor Brown was in Key West, says the Tallahassee (Fla.) Sentinel, he was presented by Hon. A. Patterson with a miniature bust of Gen. Washington, found ten years ago, in the neighborhood of Mr. Patterson's premises, imbedded in the limestone which forms the island. The bust is of marble, and is evidently the work of a master. The expression is said to be identical with that of the famous statue of Washington at Richmond, allowed to be the best likeness in existence. The little bust is in a state of perfect preservation; all the delicate chiseling in the plaits of a ruffled shirt remaining as sharp and well-defined as ever, and the marble without discoloration. Across the shoulders is inscribed the word "Washington." In the same spot two English guineas were found. All were probably deposits by some freebooter of the olden time.

Girls' School in China.—The missionaries in China from the Episcopal Church in America, are making frequent and urgent appeals for help to erect suitable buildings, for a Girls' School at Shanghae. Hitherto, they say, nearly all the educational efforts of the mission have been expended on boys, but now the time has come when some arrangement for the education of girls, consistent with the customs of the country, seems indispensable.

The price of tickets has been fixed at one, two, and three dollars, according to locality.

At Temesvar, in Hungary, the powder magazine in the Citadel exploded on the 3d ult., killing twenty persons. The following is an account of it written from the place:—

"This morning, at 7 o'clock, a noise like thunder was heard over the city, followed by a sound like a heavy fall of rain; every window in the city was smashed to atoms, the doors in all the houses, even those which were locked, were burst open, masses of masonry strewed the streets, and a dense mass of smoke darkened the atmosphere. In a few minutes the noise of the explosion ceased, and the cause was ascertained—the powder magazine near the Transylvanian barracks had blown up. People hastened to the barracks as soon as the smoke had cleared away. Of the magazine itself, a large building, with substantial walls, nothing remained but a heap of smoking ruins, from which occasionally a shell exploded. The whole roof of the barracks was blown away, the walls riddled with shells and other materials, which had been thrown likewise into every part of the town, committing havoc where they exploded. Legs and arms and corpses, horribly mutilated, were scattered in all directions. The exact number of killed has not yet been ascertained. Two captains and forty privates are reported dead. Half an hour later a whole battallion would have been on exercise in the barrack yard, and probably exterminated. The town gates are so seriously damaged that they are unsafe. At the moment I am writing, the shells continue to explode, some rising to a great height in the air. It is not safe to venture near the spot. Ten hundred weight of powder is deposited at no great distance, but it is hoped that it will not be ignited. Members of some of the unhappy victims were found 1,500 yards from the spot. Nearly all the inhabitants have fled from the city for safety. No clue to this disaster has as yet been found."

In Sicily there was a tremendous storm on March 13 and 14:—

Its ravages, says the Official Journal, were not confined to Palermo, but extended also to Messina, Cefala, and the neighborhood. Cliffs and rocks have fallen down in many places and caused inundations by stopping the course of rivers already swollen by heavy rains; houses have been swept away, with their inmates; gardens, vine-yards, olive plantations, &c., are now transformed into deserts. At Montemaggiore, one third of the houses lie buried under an immense mass of earth detached from the adjoining mountain; but the inhabitants had fortunately foreseen the impending danger, and had taken to timely flight. Another land-slip occurred at Schlafani, and overwhelmed the mineral baths at that place. It has not yet been ascertained whether any lives were lost. The road from Cefala to Messina is perfectly impassable. Hundreds of fishing boats have been wrecked on the coast.

At Athens, Rev. Mr. King, the well-known American missionary, has got into trouble, which is thus described by the Courier of that city:—

"A disgraceful scene took place on Sunday, 22d, in the house of Mr. King, a Protestant minister. This gentleman, who is an American subject, has been in the habit of preaching every Sunday at a fixed hour, in the Greek language, on which occasion the entrance to his house is always open to the public. Hitherto not more than a dozen young persons have been in the habit of attending, but on Sunday last upward of fifty presented themselves at the moment Mr. King, in alluding to the crime of Cain, pointed out the disastrous results of religious divisions. Suddenly one of his auditors, interrupting Mr. King, expressed a wish to put sundry questions to him. Mr. King mildly replied, that if the questions referred immediately to the subject on which he was then speaking, he would answer them immediately; but that, if such was not the case, he would defer the discussion to another day. On this the interrupter demanded an immediate solution; some of the persons present supported him, while others opposed him; and such a terrific noise ensued, that Mr. King, thinking himself in danger, left the pulpit, protesting against the violence used against him, and hoisted the American flag on his house. The crowd then left, uttering loud murmurs, but without committing any act of hostility."

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. Edwards, E. A. Park, and M. Stuart, of Andover; Dr. Robinson and H. B. Smith, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has beee received in the short time which has elapsed since thn union was made public, and the universal approbatiog of the measure which the publisher is daily receivin through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

Terms.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the Bibliotheca Sacra, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf with marbled edges, at $25 00.

☞ Orders should be addressed to
W. F. DRAPER,
Publisher, Andover, Mass.

Miscellaneous.

A Man Starving.

From Mrs. Nicholson's "Annals of the Famine in Ireland."

The first starving person that I saw was a few days after the story of the woman and dog had been related. A servant in the house where I was stopping, at Kingstown, said that the milk woman wished me to see a man near by, that was in a state of actual starvation; and he was going out to attempt to work on the Queen's Highway; a little labor was beginning opposite the house, and fifteen pence stimulated this poor man, who had seven to support, his rent to pay, his fuel to buy. He had been sick with fever: the clothes of his family that would fetch any price, had been pawned or sold, and all were starving together. He staggered with his spade to the work; the overseer objected; but he entreated to be allowed to try. The servant went out and asked him to step into the kitchen; and, reader, if you have never seen a starving human being, may you never! In my childhood I had been frightened with the stories of ghosts, and had seen actual skeletons; but imagination had come short of the sight of this man. And here, to those who have never watched the progress of protracted hunger, it might be proper to say, that persons will live for months, and pass through different stages, and life will struggle on to maintain her lawful hold, if occasional scanty supplies are given, till the walking skeleton is reduced to a state of insanity—he sees you not, he heeds you not, neither does he beg. The first stage is somewhat clamarous—will not easily be put off; the next is patient, passive stupidity; and the last is idiocy. In the second stage they will stand at a window for hours, without asking charty, giving a vacant stare, and not until peremptorily driven away will they move. In the last state, the head bends forward, and they walk with long strides, and pass you unheedingly. The man before mentioned was emaciated to the last degree; he was tall, his eyes prominent, his skin shriveled, his manner cringing and childlike; and the impression then and there made never has, nor never can be effaced; it was the first, and the beginning of these dreadful days yet in reserve. He had a breakfast, and was told to come in at four and get his dinner. The family were from home; the servant had an Irish heart, consequently my endeavors were all seconded. Often has she taken the loaf allowed for her board wages, (that is, so much allowed weekly for food,) and sliced nearly the whole away—denying herself for the suffering around her. It must be mentioned that laborers for the public, on roads, seldom or never ate more than twice a day, at ten and four; their food was the potato and oatmeal stirabout, and buttermilk, the luxury which was seldom enjoyed. This man was fed on Indian meal, gruel, buttermilk, or new milk and bread in the morning, stirabout, buttermilk and bread at four. Workmen are not paid at night on the public works, they must wait a week; and if they commence labor in a state of hunger, they often die before the week expires; many have been carried home to their wretched cabins some dead and others dying, who had fallen down with the spade in their hand. The next day after the wretched man was fed, another, in like condition, at work in the same place, was called in and fed; he afterward died, when the labor was finished, and he could get no more work. The first man gradually gained strength, and all for him was encouraging; when my purse became low—so many had been fed at the door that a pot was kept continually boiling, from seven in the morning till seven at night; Indian meal was then dear; the Americans had not sent their supplies; and much did my heart shrink at the thought that my means must be exhausted.

The Hillotype.

Mr. L. L. Hill, the discoverer—who resides in the secluded village of Westkill, behind the Catskill mountains, in Greene county, New York—is, or was a clergyman, who was compelled, some years since, to abandon the pulpit in consequence of some severe bronchial affection by which he was incapaciated. Seeking at first amusement in the daguerreotype art, he afterwrad adopted it as a profession, pursuing it principally or altogether in the rural districts of the Empire State, and only making himself known to the world by a "Treatise on the Daguerreotype," of which he is the author. This—with the fact that he commenced experimenting for colored daguerreotypes some two years ago, and obtained his first successful results only a few months since; and the further circumstance that he is a poor man," who needs the compensation which he is certain to obtain for his brilliant discovery—is all at present known personally of a man whose name is hereafter destined to attract unusual attention.

In regard to the secret of his discovery it is not to be supposed that we can glean any information from his published letters, or that the world be favored with any, until he has taken all the steps requisite to secure the enjoyment of his invention. "My wife and myself alone," says he, "know the process, and not a scrap or item shall ever be communicated until I am made perfectly sure of suitable compensation." All that he has divulged is, that the mystery is dependent on the new and "singular compound" which he, one day unexpectedly formed, and as unexpectedly found to be the grand arcanum and philosopher's stone, of which he had been so long in quest. Of this he gives the following account:

"The compound above referred to is to me a non-descript, through I have made the science of chemistry my study for years. That it is a new substance, or combination of substances, I am positive; and this is all I know concerning it. It is simply and easily produced, but not by any law stated in the large number of chemical works with which I am familiar. Doubtless, however, a correct and thorough analysis will determine its nature."

At the date, of this communication—Feb. 4—Mr. Hill had forty-five specimens of the Hillotype, of the character of which some idea may be formed from his description, which we quote as follows:

"1. A view containing a red house, green grass, and foliage, the wood color of the trees, several cows of different shades of red and brindle, colored garments on a clothes line, blue sky, and the faint blue of the atmosphere, intervening between the camera and the distant mountains, very delicately spread over the picture as if by the hand of a fairy artist.

"2. A sunset scene, in which the play of colors upon the clouds are impressed with a truthfulness and gorgeous beauty which I cannot describe.

"Several portraits, in which I have the true complexion of the skin, the rosy cheeks and lips, blue and hazel eyes, auburn, brown, and sandy hair, and every color of the drapery. Changeable silk is given in all its fine blendings of colors and delicate richness of hues. I not only can get red, blue, orange, violet, &c., but their various tints. The whole impression, including the lights and shades, is far more brilliant, round, and mellow than the most superb daguerrean image I have ever seen."

He adds:—"I have a most exquisite type of my little girl, (one year old,) taken in the act of crying, the plate not having been exposed a full second. At the same time my light required fifteen seconds for a daguerreotype. This picture has caught the expression perfectly, both of the eye and whole face. On one cheek is seen a bright tear drop, and the color showing through it much deeper than the surrounding parts; which, latter, I suppose, is owing to the refractive action of the fluid."

Sewing Machines.

We had heard a good deal about this sewing machine, invented by Mr. M. Singer, but never had an opportunity of witnessing its practical operation until yesterday, when a friend invited us to go with him to Shepherd's, 256 Broadway, where it is now in operation. We must try to describe it as we can.

A table of iron, with a moveable brass ribbon running across it and cut open in the middle, beneath which the fairy shuttle which does the job flies daintily to and fro, receives the cloth—the edges, or wherever the seam is to be sewed, being held down by a little tin thumb nail pressed downward from above. Just outside this thumb the needle works (or rather plays, for sewing by this process can scarcely be called work) horizontally, the eye being about one-third the distance from the point to the heel. The length of the stitch is regulated to the most bair-breadth precision by simply turning a screw; and by a principle as novel, as it is beautiful, the loop is infallibly made, and the tension ef the thread is adjusted in a moment to any sort of fabric or work. The machine sews leather as well as cloth; and it is already entirely employed in several of the largest New England shoe factories, where it works admirably.

The comparative speed of sewing by Mr. Singer's machine and by hand can be thus stated. A good seamstress averages forty stitches a minute—the machine makes with ease five hundred a minute, or more than twelve times the number—and with greatly superior closeness and evenness. [Day Book.

A Leopard under the Influence of Chloroform.

During the last three or four days says the London Globe, the visitors to the Zoological Garden, Regent's Park, have been grieved at seeing the beautiful male chetah, or hunting leopard, lately presented to the Zoological Society of London, by the Pasha of Egypt, limping about in its den on three legs. The friends of the brute creation will, however, be pleased to find that in the advantages arising from an improved state of surgical science, and in the discoveries which have been made for the purpose of alleviating or preventing pain while undergoing surgical operations, the lower and even wild animals come in for their share.

It happened that about ten days since, the male chetah, in its gambols, got one of his hind legs between the bars of its den, and in its violence to get released, sustained a severe compound fracture of the limb. Prof. Simmons, of the Royal Veterinary College, at Camden Town, was consulted on the subject, and, as the nature of the accident would apparently render all attempts to save the leg ineffectual, amputation half way down the thigh was decided on as the only means of preserving the animal's life.

The operation was performed on Monday last, in a very skillful manner, Prof. Simmons, assisted by Mr. Fraser, surgeon of Oakley Square, (who considered the case sufficiently interesting to merit the attendance of a practioner of human surgery) and the keeper. Previous to undergoing the operation, the animal was made to inhale chloroform, by applying to its mouth and nostrils a sponge moistened with that liquid, and fastened to the end of a stick. Its dislike to this part of the process was very loudly expressed; it, however, soon fell under the influence of the chloroform, which evidently rendered it totally insensible to suffering. as it lay perfectly motionless and quiet during the operation, and until its removal from the operating table, when it speedily revived and moved about on its remaining three legs as though nothing had occurred. The last "bulletin" states the patient to be getting on "as well as can be expected," and no doubt is entertained of the favorable result of the case, except that occasioned by the restless nature of the animal, and the fear that, in consequence, it may knock the stump about and so cause inflammation and fever.

Decay of Peach Trees.

A singular fact, and one worthy of being recorded, was mentioned a few days since by Mr. Alexander Duke, of Albemarle. He stated that whilst on a visit to his neighbor, his attention was called to a large orchard, every tree in which had been totally destroyed by the ravages of the worm, with the exception of three; and these three were probably the most thrifty and flourishing peach trees he ever saw. The only cause of their superiority known to his host was an experiment made in consequence of observing that parts of worm-eaten timber, into which nails had been driven, were generally sound. When his trees were about a year old, he had selected three of them and driven a tenpenny nail through the body, as near the ground as possible; whilst the balance of the orchard had gradually failed, and finally yielded entirely to the ravages of the worms, these three trees, selected at random, treated precisely in the same manner, with the exception of the nailing, had always been vigorous and healthy, furnishing at that very period the greatest profusion of the most luscious fruit. It is supposed that the salt of iron afforded by the nail, is offensive to the worm, while it is harmless, or even beneficial to the tree. [Plant.

The Hazards of Mercantile Life.

From an article in a late number of Hunt's Magazine we copy the following interesting statements. They afford a melancholy illustration of the hazards and fluctuations of mercantile life:—

"It is asserted that but one eminent merchant (and his death is still recent and lamented) has ever continued in active business in the city of New York to the close of a long life, without undergoing bankruptcy or a suspension of payments in some of the various crisis through which the country has necessarily passed. I have no means of determining the truth of this assertion, but it must have some foundation, and I think it would be difficult for either of us to add to the number.

"It is also asserted by reliable authority, from records kept during periods of twenty to forty years, that, of every hundred persons who commence business in Boston, ninety-five at least die poor; that of the same number in New York, not two ultimately acquire wealth, after passing through the intermediate process of bankruptcy; while in Philadelphia the proportion is stil smaller.

"By the statistics of bankruptcy, as collected under the uniform bankrupt law of 1841—

The number of applicants for relief under that law were	38,739
The number of creditors returned	1,049,603
The amount of debts stated	440,934,615
The valuation of property surrendered	43,597,307

"If this valuation were correct, nearly ten cents would have been paid on every dollar due, but what was the fact?

"In the southern district of New York one cent was paid, on an average, for each dollar due; in the northern district, 13⅔ cents, being by far the largest dividend. In Connecticut the average dividend was somewhat over half a cent on each dollar.

In Mississippi it was	6 cents to	$1,000
In Maine	½ "	100
In Michigan and Iowa	¼ "	100
In Massachusetts	4 "	100
In New Jersey	1 "	100
In Tennesse	4½ "	100
In Maryland	1 dollar to	100
In Kentucky	8 "	1,000
In Illinois	1 "	1,500

In Pennsylvania, East Virginia, South Alabama, Washington, Nothing."

Ida Pfeifer, the Traveler.

"This lady, of a humble, simple appearance, but endowed with uncommon qualities, has arrived in London. She has distinguished herself by her extensive travels in distant lands; and, strange to say, she has gone immense distances without her companion, overcoming the greatest difficulties by her unaided genius, and penetrating into the midst of what Europeans are pleased to call 'the most uncivilized nations,' passing through them unscathed, without any other protection than her harmless disposition and her firm confidence in Providence. Mrs. Pfeifer is a native of Vienna. Her traveling propensity manifested itself from her earliest childhood, and she gratified it then by roaming about in the neighborhood of that city. It was only late in life that she was able to indulge more fully in her predominant propensity. During the earlier part of her life, she attended with exemplary devotion to the duties of a wife and mother. When her children had grown up to manhood, and gained an independence for themselves, she then thought herself justified in following a propensity which was in her so powerfully at work, and which prompted her to leave a comfortable home and many loving friends. She first directed her steps to Palestine and Egypt. After her return she visited Scandinavia and Iceland. Then she set out on a voyage round the world, landing in Brazil, surmounting the Parahyby, and penetrating through thick, primitive forests, to visit the aborigines at their own homes; then passing Cape Horn, touching at Valparaiso, she traversed the Pacific Ocean to Otaheite and China, Singapore and Ceylon, as far as Kandy; wandering hence to Bengal, Hindostan, and Delhi, turning her steps to the caves of Adjunta and Ellora, to Bombay. From that spot she sailed through the Arabian and Persian Sea to Bassora, followed the Tigris up to Bagdad, continuing to pass over an immense country to Babylon, Mosul, Nineveh, into Kurdistan, and Persia's second capital, Tabris. Pursuing her course over Tiflis, along the Caucasus, she embarked at Redout Kali for Constantinople and Greece, whence she returned to her native country. She speaks in glowing terms of the kindness she met with at the hands of some of the tribes who are considered to be most backward in civilization."

Indian Antiquities.

Mr. Stephen Taylor, the President of the Board of Commissioners of Richmond, has appropriated a spacious lot adjoining his dwelling in that district, to the portraiture of the famed Indian mounds and fanciful earthy protuberances to be found in various parts of the West and South-West. Mr. T., while an officer of the General Government, some years since, explored the recesses of the forest for the purpose of obtaining information in regard to these peculiar works. These researches became known to Professor Silliman, who requested of Mr. T. an essay on the subject, which was published in the American Journal of Science and Arts. The miniature representations in Richmond comprise the ordinary cones so frequently found in the West, the colossal human figures, and those of birds and beasts. A portion of the ground is laid out in a representation of the ancient city of Azatlan, and conveys a good idea of its massive walls of burnt clay. The whole arrangement is highly interesting, and calculated to impress the beholder with a practical knowledge of these mysterious constructions of the Red Man. It has been got up solely with that view and as an ornament to the neighborhood.

FLAX COTTON IN GREAT BRITAIN.—The London correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser says of Flax Cotton:—

The use of flax cotton, manufactured according to the process of Chevalier Claussen, is now in progress upon an extensive scale at Bradford, in Yorkshire, and at Cork, in Ireland, large mill owners having entered into contracts. The principle of the invention, by which flax is adapted for spinning upon cotton, wool, and silk machinery, consists in the destruction of the cylindrical character of the fibre by the expansive power of carbonic acid gas. The first process, however, is the removal of the resinous matter peculiar to the plant. This is effected by boiling it for three hours in water, containing one half per cent. of common soda, after which it is dipped in water slightly acidulated with sulphuric acid. The flax is then thoroughly saturated in a solution of bi-carbonate of soda, and being subsequently immersed in a solution of diluted sulphuric acid, a liberation of gas takes place, which causes the tubes of which the plant is composed to split, when the material, instantly losing its rigidity, becomes a light, expansive mass, of cottony texture, "increasing in size like leavening dough or an expanding sponge." Lastly, for the purpose of being bleached, it is plunged into hypochlorite of magnesia, when it instantly becomes white. A very general opinion prevails, that the invention will lead to rapid and extraordinary results. Sixty tons of the cotton are now being prepared for the Manchester market.

Locusts.

"Soon after my return, I was standing on my terrace, when my attention was attracted by what seemed to be a moving cloud. A dark compact body of insects came floating along from the west, while here and there a straggler lingered behind, and, after vain attempts to join the main column, fell exhausted on the terrace before me. I took up one of these in my hand, and was soon watching, with mingled curiosity and compassion, the last moments of an expiring locust. Despite their destructive qualities, I could not help pitying the poor weary insect, who, after a flight of so many miles, was doomed to sink down with the land of plenty before his eyes. A few minutes longer and he would have been banqueting with his more fortunate brethren on the olive trees of Bagh Sheikha, or the corn fields of old Ninevah. I placed a drop or two of water in the palm of my hand; he seemed to drink eagerly of the refreshing element; but his brief span of life was closing, and I laid him down to die.

"As the locusts proceeded, great numbers of them fell and covered the terraces of the city in heaps. Their color was a darkish yellow, and they were about an inch and a half in length. Their whole appearance resembled very much that of a grasshopper.

"The last straggler had crossed the Tigris, and the people around all appeared on the neighboring terraces, furnished with large baskets, into which they threw whole heaps of the dead and dying insects. I was not sorry to get rid of them, on account of the stench which arose from their rapidly decaying bodies. The putrefaction of locusts is said to have been the cause of plague in various parts of Asiatic Turkey. Their ravages are much dreaded, for they leave all the trees quite bare, stripping off even the hardest bark. I have heard that on some occasions they have entered houses in a body, and commenced destroying everything that they could find." [Fletcher:

Driving Trees.

"But felling a single tree is a small matter compared to a process called here "driving trees!" Don't imagine a whole "Birman" on the move for "Dunsinane," like a flock of sheep going to market; but sit down with me here on the side-hill, and look at that opposite mountain slope. Just above that black fallow, or as they call it here "foller," there, in that deep grove, five as good choppers as ever swung an axe, have made the woods ring for the last three hours with their steady strokes, and yet not a tree has fallen. But, look! now one begins to bend—and hark, crack! crack! crash! crash! a whole forest seems falling, and a gap is made like the path of a whirlwind. Those choppers worked both down and up the hill, cutting each tree half in two, until they got twenty or more thus partially severed. They did not cut at random, but chose each tree with reference to another. At length a sufficient number being prepared, they felled one that was certain to strike a second that was half severed, and this a third, and so on, till fifteen or twenty came at once with that tremendous crash to the ground. Here is labor-saving without machinery. The process is called "driving trees," and it is driving them with a vengeance." [Headley.

THE REV. DR. VAUGHAN'S FIRST GUINEA.—At the annual meeting of the Oldham Lyceum, last week, the Rev. Dr. Vaughan gave the the following interesting incident of his own history:—He well remembered, when a little boy, becomiug very affluent when possessed of his first guinea. He turned out into the streets of Bristol, looking into all the shops, and turning over and over his guinea, putting it first into one pocket, and then in another; then again looking at it. At last he turned into a book-auction, where the "History of the World," in two volumes, was standing at 7s. Eight was bid. "Going, going." He bid 9s., with his chin scarce higher than the table. Nobody bid against the boy, and he got the whole world for 9s., which he carried exultingly home on his shoulders. He sat reading till midnight, and those books were read through and through many a time; and they had formed the taste and created that passion for reading which he would not lose for the wealth of the Indies; and now, when perplexed in mind or oppressed with trouble, he would down with his book or history, and away fled the trouble and the sorrow, which was soon forgot. [Morning Advertiser.

A SOFA MADE OF COAL.—The Fife Advertiser, referring to one peculiar characteristic of the coal found in that district, which can be converted into articles of household furniture, such as looking-glass frames, writing-desks, chairs, and tables, states that Mr. William Williamson is at present engaged in making a sofa wholly composed of coal. It is nine feet long, with three compartments or divisions, and is sufficent to contain seven people sitting on it. The front standards are beautifully carved, displaying three mongrel animals, which forcibly remind the spectators of those richly carved figures that appear so frequently in Dr. Layard's remains of ancient Babylon. This rare geological curiosity was ordered by General Wemyss, and it is highly probable that it will appear at the Great Exhibition, as it was ordered to be finished previously to that time; and as the General holds an appointment in the Queen's household, it may yet be transferred from the Crystal Palace to the palace of her Majesty.

ENORMOUS MASS OF PURE COPPER.—We stated a day or two since, (says the N. Y. Tribune,) that the Cliff mine on Lake Superior had more copper uncovered than could be got out by the present force in three years. We have since ascertained the dimensions of one single sheet which they are at present working on, which presents the following almost incredible dimensions; forty feet long, eighteen feet high, and from six inches to three feet thick. It probably weighs three hundred tons, and the miners have not yet reached either the end or the top of the sheet. It may possibly be two or three times as large as has yet been developed. The public at large are entirely in the dark in regard to the riches of the Lake Superior mineral districts.

A NEWSPAPER PRINTED IN GOLD.—We are indebted to Mr. Simmons of Oak Hall, who has just returned from a business visit to California, for San Francisco newspapers; and also for a look at a copy of the Alta Californian, printed in gold, and designed for the great Exhibition in London. The paper is white satin, printed on both sides, with some preparations of the real dust, so as to exhibit a gold face. The idea is a good one, and although printing in gold is no new thing, it is not common to beautify newspapers in that manner. The present specimen not only shows what can be done, but renders the paper a more emphatic illustration of the character and productions of El Dorado. [Boston Traveler.

Variety.

The patent omnibuses newly invented by Mr. J. A. Franklin of London, are great things, if they are anything at all. Around the vehicle runs a gallery by which each passenger goes to his place, being admitted thereto by a private door which opens on that place alone. His seat is the perfection of comfort, and before him is a mirror in which he can study his own physiognomy undisturbed. A pipe of gutta percha leads to the driver, with whom he can confer whenever he desires.

A beautiful trait of Hurdis, the poet, is mentioned by Southey. He used to let the wheatears out of their traps, and leave their price for their ransom. This was to be just and generous both.

"CHURCH ACTION ON SABBATH DESECRATION."

We learn with pleasure, that the subject of Sabbath Desecration is exciting interest in the minds of many at the present time, and that a mutual interchange of views is called for by those interested. It is earnestly to be desired, that in such interchange of views upon this subject, we may ever be guided by the spirit of earnest seekers after truth, and that when the truth is found we may receive it with joy, adopting it as the rule of action. It is fondly believed, that it is the aim of the entire denomination to make the Sabbath "a delight, holy of the Lord;" yet as individuals, as churches, and indeed as a denomination, we may sometimes err in the application of the spirit of the law of the Sabbath to particular cases. Such, it is feared by many, is the case with the First Church of Alfred, in the late action on the subject of Sabbath Desecration. Some feel—deeply feel—that its influence has been cast on the side of Sabbath profanation—cast in that direction, the tendency of which is ever downward, instead of upward, exalting, holy. God grant that such may not be the result.

"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy," is an injunction resting upon mankind universally. No acts, save those bearing the impress of holiness to the Lord, are to have place on that day. The question is, What acts are conformable to this law—to the spirit of holiness—and what are not? Our Saviour tells us that "the Sabbath was made for man;" consequently we should naturally infer that Sabbath duties are conformable to the highest interests of man? What are his highest interests? Evidently his moral and religious interests. All of his other interests are of minor importance; hence, when they conflict with his higher interests, the lower must evidently give place to the higher. Is not this the principle that Christ, by his examples and precepts, inculcated? Is not this a fundamental principle, running like a ray of light through all of our Sabbath relations, separating our duties from things forbidden? Christ has taught us that deeds of necessity and deeds of mercy, come under the head of allowable Sabbath duties; hence they are for man. Acts of mercy may be considered the same as acts of necessity, only in a less intensive form or sense—the same in kind, but not in degree. Deeds of necessity are absolutely required to save life or mitigate suffering. As such, they are demanded by the highest principles of our nature. Deeds of mercy are evidently allowable, not on the ground of saving property, but on the ground of their being required by some of the highest impulses which the Creator has implanted within the human heart; such as benevolence, compassion, tenderness, kindness, love, &c. If this is the case, they are demanded by the highest interests both of the agent and recepient of the deed.

With these principles established, let us inquire into the principal reasons upon which the before-named church action was predicated. In regard to traveling, hay-making, sugar-making, &c., there seems to have been no difference of opinion. All agreed in ranking them among forbidden employments—a decision that will be upheld and applauded by every conscientious Christian, as being in accordance with the teachings of the Word of God. But the difficulty seems to have been, that the Report unjustly placed cheese-making in the same category with the things above mentioned; hence it is said that "the odium justly attached to the above-named offenses unjustly attached to cheese-making." The reasons assigned, why the same odium should not be attached were these: "If a law of nature required the cutting of hay or grain on the Sabbath, then the plain inference would be, that they might be gathered also on the Sabbath. But there is no such law of nature; therefore grain may not be gathered on the Sabbath. But there is a law of nature requiring us to milk our cows on the Sabbath; therefore milk may be saved on the Sabbath."

There is an evident fallacy in the above argument. The fallacy is that of making the ground of saving or not saving, lie in the fact that we perform in obtaining what "nature, unsought, places in our hands." The argument, stated in syllogistic form, would be this: Whatever we assist nature in bestowing upon us, on the Sabbath, we are bound to save; we assist nature in pouring the milk into our pails; therefore we are bound to save it. Whatever we do not assist nature in bestowing upon us, may not be saved; we do not assist nature in pouring the sap into our buckets; therefore sap may not be saved. Again: whatever we assist nature in placing in a situation which renders it incapable of remaining over the Sabbath, we are bound to save, but whatever we do not assist nature in placing in that situation, we may not save; we assist nature in placing the milk in that situation, but not in placing grain, hay, and the like, there; therefore, we may save the milk, but may not save hay, grain and the like.

Now, we have, in the major premises of these syllogisms, palpable contradictions—contradictions that cannot be supported by reason or revelation. In the one case, God bestows a blessing, but we may not save it; in the other, he bestows one by our assistance, and we are in duty bound to work on the Sabbath to save it. Permit me to ask, Wherein consists the purifying, sanctifying influence of our coöperation in the laws of nature? Does the fourth commandment teach us that upon the Sabbath we shall not do any work, except make cheese, which we may freely do, and that from the sanctifying influences thrown around it by the previous operation of milking? Does Christ, or do his apostles, make any proviso in favor of the same? If not, then it follows, that if we are bound to save that which nature by our assistance, places in our hands, we are also bound to save that which nature, unsought, and without our assistance, places in our hands. The particular quo modo, or manner of our receiving the blessing, does not appear to have anything to do with our future course, provided that the manner of reception be right, which is supposed to be the case in both of these instances.

To illustrate: Suppose that we have our buckets full of sap, our pails full of milk, our fields covered over with grain and hay. Now, if the sap, hay, milk, and grain, are in that state which renders them "incapable of lying over without damage or absolute loss," we are in duty bound to labor on the Sabbath to save one as much as another. There is no inherent virtue in one of these that is not in the rest, which will make it right to save it, and not the other; for God's favors are just as pure and holy without our coöperation, as with it. They may not all require the same degree of labor, but they all require the same kind, that is, physical labor.

Such is the dilemma in which we are involved by following out the legitimate tendencies of the before-named argument. If such is the conclusion to which we are driven, may we not well stop and ask, Is the principle of saving the ultimate principle on which to base any of our Sabbath acts? Is it the principle on which Christ predicated his declaration, that "the Sabbath was made for man?" Did he ever construe it thus by his acts or precepts? Did he ever do or sanction any work on the Sabbath, that was not prompted by the moral or religious emotions of our nature, hence tending to man's highest or spiritual interests? If the mere saving of property is the ultimate ruling motive, have we any more right to violate the law of the Sabbath, to gratify that motive or propensity when it comes in conflict with the higher interests of our nature, than we have to gratify any other propensity conflicting with our spiritual interests on that day?

In the next place, let us notice the manner in which the milk is to be saved. The plan proposed is, "that we are to pursue that course which will best exclude waste, coupled with the least labor." It was farther remarked, that "cheese-making was as unobjectionable, upon the whole, as any other form." To this we would reply, that if it be true, as we have shown, that the saving of milk on the Sabbath is no more sanctioned, than the saving of hay, grain or sap, then it would follow, as a logical sequence, that if we are to pursue that plan which will save most with the least labor, in the matter of milk, we are in duty bound to pursue the same course in regard to hay, grain, &c. Farther than this, if by working one hour, we could save one dollar's worth of milk, or two dollars' worth of sap, or four of hay, or eight of grain, our obligations would be eight times as great to save the grain as the milk. If, therefore, dairymen are pursuing a laudable and justifiable occupation in making cheese upon the Sabbath, every other man that is making a saving on that day, is engaged in an occupation which increases in sanctity in the same proportion as the ratio between the labor and the amount saved increases.

But, admitting that the "course which best excludes waste, coupled with the least labor," is the true, scriptural course of procedure, does it follow as a truth, that cheese-making is necessarily that course? We do not pretend to say but it may be the shortest, quickest method in some cases, but is it necessarily so? It is doubtless true, that some dairymen have no conveniences for saving their milk, otherwise than by making it into cheese. But have such taken as much pains in providing for the sanctity of the Sabbath, as for their secular employments? Is it not true, to a great extent at least, that while improvements are continually going on in all of the operations of dairying, there is comparatively little attention paid to improvements, which would exclude labor on the Sabbath? There have been various plans suggested by which milk can be saved without requiring such a sacrifice of Sabbath obligations, as cheese-making does—such as setting the milk in pans, tubs, tin vats, or cisterns, placed in the cellar, with a tube leading from the tub to them, and other similar plans. We do not pretend to say whether any of these are the best that could be proposed, but we do confidently believe, that these or some other method within the scope of human ingenuity can be adopted, which will prevent the great sacrifice of holy time now made.

There are other important points in connection with this subject that might well be considered; but the already extended limits of this article will, at present, prevent.

THUISCON.

CHILDHOOD.

BY DAVID BATES.

Childhood, sweet and sunny childhood,
With its careless, thoughtless air,
Like the verdant, tangled wildwood,
Wants the training hand of care.

For it springeth all around us—
Glad to know and quick to learn;
Asking questions that confound us;
Teaching lessons in its turn.

Who loves not its joyous revel,
Leaping lightly on the lawn,
Up the knoll, along the level,
Free and graceful as a fawn?

Let it revel; it is nature,
Giving to the little dears
Strength of limb and healthful features,
For the toil of coming years.

He who checks a child with terror,
Stops its play, and stills its song,
Not alone commits an error,
But a great and moral wrong.

Give it play, and never fear it—
Active life is no defect;
Never, never break its spirit—
Curb it only to direct.

Would you dam the flowing river,
Thinking it would cease to flow?
Onward it must go forever—
Better teach it where to go.

Childhood is a fountain welling,
Trace its channel in the sand,
And its currents, spreading, swelling,
Will revive the withered land.

Childhood is the vernal season;
Trim and train the verdant shoot;
Love is to the coming reason,
As the blossom to the fruit.

Tender twigs are bent and folded;
Art to nature beauty lends;
Childhood easily is molded;
Manhood breaks, but seldom bends.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

PRESBYTERIAN FOREIGN MISSION BOARD.

The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church held a meeting at their Mission House in New York on Second-day, May 5th. The principal business transacted was the reading of the Fourteenth Annual Report. The following will be found particularly interesting, as exhibiting the financial condition of the Society, as well as the success which has attended its efforts in the Chinese Missions. The receipts from all sources, as stated in the Treasurer's Report, have been $140,221 72; the expenditures have been $140,085 56; leaving a balance in favor of the Treasury of $136 16. In China the Board has three Missions, having stations at Canton, Ningpo, and Shanghae; ten ministers, one physician, and one superintendent of the press; one native assistant; nine females, the wives of missionaries. Six native communicants are reported at Ningpo; 124 children are under daily instruction, most of whom are in boarding-schools—many of them supported by the children of the churches; 3,000,000 pages were printed at the Ningpo press; over 2,200 patients were prescribed for. Several services for preaching are held at the different stations. A large and respectable church is nearly completed at Ningpo, and a chapel to hold two hundred hearers. The new Mission at Shanghae is one of great present and prospective importance. The missionaries speak of the removal of some of the former difficulties and plead earnestly for a larger number of laborers. The Board adjourned, to meet again at St. Louis during the sessions of the Presbyterian Assembly, which convenes in that city on the 16th inst.

AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY.

The Twenty-third Anniversary of this Society was celebrated in the Broadway Tabernacle, Third-day evening, May 6th. An original hymn was sung by the congregation. After prayer, an Abstract of the Annual Report was read by Rev. J. Spaulding, one of the Secretaries, from which it appears that, in addition to what the Society is doing at home, it sustains chaplains and missionaries to labor among the seamen in Canton, Honolulu, Lahaina, Valparaiso, St. Thomas, Havana, Havre, Bordeaux, Gottenburg, Stockholm, Island of Gottland, and has recently commissioned one for Rio de Janeiro. Arrangements are also in progress for placing chaplains in other important ports.

Nine years ago, this Society opened a commodious Sailor's Home, or Temperance Boarding-House, in the City of New York. The number of its boarders the last year was 2,525; of these 105 were wrecked or destitute, and received aid in board and clothing to the amount of $625 56. The whole number of sailor-boarders since the Home was opened is 30,000. It has been a protection to their money and morals, and been the means of their professional elevation and general improvement. Capt. M. Sayer, the Superintendent, has deposited in the Savings Bank within the past year, for eighty-two of them $5,247; while many others have made deposits for themselves. Other similar institutions are happily and most efficiently aiding in the same work; affording seamen protection from the destructive influences of those places where intoxicating liquors are furnished.

Something has also been done by way of furnishing ships with suitable libraries, and seamen with good books.

The receipts of the Society for the year ending the 1st inst., were $20,398 91, and the expenditures $20,445 57. In this amount is not included a considerable amount raised by its chaplains abroad, nor a still larger amount raised by Auxiliary Societies and disbursed from their treasuries. The total amount would exceed $75,000.

A review of the past year exhibits the most gratifying results in the fruits of sobriety; in the improved discipline and cheerful obedience at sea; in many instances of undoubted piety and extensive usefulness.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

This Society celebrated its Anniversary on Third-day afternoon in the Broadway Tabernacle, which was crowded to its utmost extent. The meeting was organized by the appointment of Mr. Arthur Tappan as President, and Mr. Lewis Tappan as Secretary. Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. C. W Gardiner, a colored clergyman, after which the Secretary read the Annual Report, of which the following is an abstract:—

The Report expresses the belief that the great question of the day will only be settled by the emancipation of every slave. Jefferson's remark is referred to, who said, "Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than these people are to be free." The Compromise measures are examined, and while it is acknowledged that their enactment was a triumph of the slave power, it is shown that it has not as was predicted, put an end to agitation. The most insulting part of the Compromise is the Fugitive Slave Bill. The only point gained to Freedom by the Compromise was the prohibition of the future importation of slaves into the District of Columbia. President Fillmore's declamation against the encroachments of Slavery, and his letter approving Anti-Slavery principles, are mentioned in connection with his signature to the INFAMOUS BILL.

The "Union League," formed by forty-four members of Congress, of different political parties, North and South, is alluded to, and it is stated that New England furnished but one signer to the pledge, who also voted for the Fugitive Slave Bill, but lost his reëlection. Only eight of the New York members signed it—less than one fourth of her delegates, only two of whom have been reelected. Pennsylvania furnished but one signer, and there were only eleven of these persons in all the free States.

A review is taken of the motives that induced the passage of the Fugitive Slave Bill, and it is stated that the South designed to humble the North, and by making her territory a hunting ground and Northern citizens her slave catchers, to render them coöperators in supporting American Slavery, and sharers of its disgrace.

Notice is taken of the principal cases of seizure and re-enslavement under the Fugitive Slave Bill, the employment of George Wood, and other leading attornies by the Union Safety Committee, to aid the slaveholders in accomplishing their objects, and the peaceable and legal resistance made by the people of color and their friends to the iniquitous law. It is made evident that in the case of Henry Long he would have been set at liberty had Judge Campbell retained possession of Long, adjudicated the case, and decided upon the illegality of the proceedings before the sham commissioner.

The action of numerous ecclesiastical bodies against the Fugitive Slave Bill is mentioned in terms of decided approbation. On no former occasion has the voice of the religious community from the pulpit and press, with some melancholy exceptions, been more decided in favor of liberty and humanity, and it is mentioned as one of the most cheering signs of the times that so many young men in the ministry, theological seminaries, and in the legal and other professions, have thought and spoken for themselves, in tones of indignant rebuke, and in a way to shame many of their seniors and instructors who have been considered the Prophets and Gamaliels of the land.

The patriotic course taken by several Governors and State Legislatures on the subject of the law of 1850 is gratefully acknowledged. The Acts of Vermont and Ohio are deemed worthy of all praise, and it is believed that Massachusetts and other free States will follow their example.

The Constitutional question is reviewed. Many editors and others have attempted to prove the constitutionality of the law of 1850 by saying it was but little if any more stringent than that of 1793 forgetting that one reason alledged for the new law was that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided that one part of the old law was unconstitutional, viz., that part that enjoins upon State officers to execute a law of Congress. It is shown also that eminent jurists and distinguished lawyers have for years denied the constitutionality of the law of 1793 in other respects; and that among them are the names of Walworth and Webster. The law of 1850 is shown to be unconstitutional by various extracts from men learned in the law, and by its obvious denial of the Trial by Jury and the use of the Habeas Corpus. The query is also raised, how fugitive slaves can be remanded to Slavery under the Constitution, when Mr. Mason of Virginia and others have confessed that there is no statute law subjecting men to Slavery, and when of course no slaves can be said to be held in slave States, "under the laws thereof."

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.

This Society held its Twenty-sixth Anniversary at the Tabernacle, at 10 o'clock Fourth-day morning. After the usual introductory exercises, the Treasurer's report was read by Moses Allen, Esq., an abstract of which showed the receipts of the year in donations to amount to the sum of $109,897 76; for sales, $200,720 33; balance in treasury last year, $110 23; total, $310,728 32. Expenditures for paper, printing, binding, engraving copy-right, translating and revising, $170,984 48; for colportage $73,278 23; remitted to foreign and pagan lands, $2,000; other expenditures as by items in Treasurer's report, $35,356 59; total, $316,619 30; balance in the treasury, $109 02. Due for printing paper, to be paid within six months, $32,908 64.

An abstract of the Annual Report was next read by Messrs. Hallock and Cock, Secretaries, showing the results of the labors of the Society for the year. It appeared there were issued new publications in nine languages 78, of which 42 are volumes, including the Family Testament with brief Notes and Instructions, the Riches of Bunyan, Afflicted Man's Companion, Life of Summerfield, Hannah More's Cheap Repository Tracts, 8 volumes, illustrated, and 14 volumes in German; total publications on the Society's list, 1598, of which 327 are volumes, beside 2,594 approved for foreign stations in about 114 languages and dialects. Circulated during the year 686,692 volumes, 6,837,692 publications, 269,784,615 pages; total in 26 years, 6,567,795 volumes, 119,826,867 publications, 2,777,087,404 pages. Illustrated Family Christian Almanac for 1851, 310,000 copies; American Messenger, 186,000 monthly; German Messenger, 18,000. Gratuitous distributions, in 2,697 distinct grants, to missionaries at home and abroad, the army and navy, seamen, humane and criminal institutions Sabbath-schools and individuals, by colporteurs, and to life-members and directors, 56,538,543; value $37,759 03.

The Report then gives a long and detailed statement of the operations of the Society, in connection with the Colportage System, in the various States and Territories of the Union, and also in Canada and Mexico. Of the whole number of colporteurs 109 were for the German, French, Irish, Spanish, Welsh, and Norwegian population. The whole number in commission, April 1, was 368. The statistical tables show that the colporteurs have visited 505,422 families, of whom 90,779 were destitute of preaching; 68,027 were without religious books; 34,684 without the Bible, and 54,321 families were Roman Catholics. They have conversed or prayed with 238,864 families; sold 471,951 volumes; granted to the destitute 127,884 books; held prayer-meeting, or addressed public meetings to the number of 13,306, and distributed 14,291 Bibles and Testaments. The Report also contained a sketch of the history of this system for the last ten years, and showed its successful operations during that period. No less than 1,599 colportuers have been it appeared commissioned; and 2,168,793 families had been vaiid. Books to the amount of 2,424,650 were distributed also among families.

AMERICAN HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the American Home Missionary Society was celebrated at the Tabernacle on Fourth-day evening. The President, Henry Dwight, Esq., took the chair, and the proceedings were opened by prayer by Rev. Dr. Peters, of Williamstown. The Treasurer's Report and the Annual Report were then read. From these documents we make the following abstract:

More than one-third of those who were present at the organization of the Society a quarter of a century since have ceased from their labors.

The Society has had in its service the last year 1,065 ministers of the Gospel, in 26 different States and Territories: in the New England States, 311; in the Middle States, 244; the Southern States, 15; the Western States and Territories, 515. Of these, 640 have been pastors or stated supplies of single congregations, and 425 have occupied larger fields. Four have ministered to congregations of colored people; and 41 have preached in foreign languages—10 to Welsh, and 29 to German congregations; and two to congregations of Norwegians and Swedes.

The number of congregations supplied, in whole or in part, is 1,820; and the aggregate of ministerial service performed is equal to 853 years. The pupils in Sabbath-Schools and Bible-Classes amount to 70,000.

There have been added to the churches 6,678, viz., 3,855 by profession; and 2,823 by letter. Many of the Western churches have been visited with the special effusions of the Spirit. Seventy-seven missionaries make mention in their reports of revivals of religion in congregations; and 366 report 3,096 hopeful conversions.

Thirty-three more missionaries have been in commission than in any preceding year, and this increase has been mainly in the Western States and Territories; forty-one more years of ministerial labor have been performed; and two hundred and forty-five more congregations blessed with the preaching of the Gospel.

Forty-three churches have passed from a condition of dependence to that of self-support; sixty houses of worship have been completed; fifty-five others repaired; and the building of forty others commenced.

During the twenty-five years of the Society's labors, not far from 800 churches, which had been reared and nurtured by its instrumentality, have passed from the list of beneficiaries, and are now supporting their own Gospel institutions; some of which are among the strongest and most influential churches in the land.

The balance in the Treasury, April 1, 1850, was $15,553 69. The receipts of the succeeding twelve months have been $150,940 25; making the resources of the year $166,493 94.

There was due to missionaries, at the date of the last report, $11,935 77. There has since become due $151,515 41; making the total of liabilities $163,457 18.

The reading of the Reports was followed by remarks from several individuals, in support of resolutions which they presented. Rev. J. P. Langworthy, Rev. J. B. Shaw, and Hon. James Meachum, were the principal speakers.

AMERICAN FEMALE GUARDIAN SOCIETY AND HOME FOR THE FRIENDLESS.

The Anniversary of this Society was held on Fourth-day evening at 7½ o'clock at the Church of the Puritans. The programme announced that Dr. Cheever would preside, but in consequence of his unavoidable absence the Rev. Dr. Cleavland, of Providence, was called to the chair. The Rev. Mr. Bannard opened the proceedings with introductory prayer. After singing by the choir, the Rev. Mr. Benton read the Annual Report, showing the successful operations of the Society, upon which the chairman offered a few remarks, in the absence of the Rev. Messrs. Beecher and Taggart, who were also announced in the programme to be present and address the meeting. Dr. Tyng hereupon came forward and spoke briefly in favor of the operations of the Society of the Home for the Friendless, which was now in existence, he said, for five years, and after having accomplished much good, was free from debt. He concluded by saying that having always aided the Society in its operations, he would continue to do so upon every occasion. After taking up a collection, the Society separated about 9 o'clock.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

This Society held its Thirty-fifth Anniversary at the Tabernacle on Fifth-day morning, at 10 o'clock, Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, President, in the chair. Dr. Tyng opened the proceedings with prayer, after which the President read the Address. The Treasurer's Report was read by Joseph Hyde, Esq., General Agent, and by the Assistant Treasurer. It showed that the receipts of the year, from all sources, have been $276,882 52. This sum, including legacies, is somewhat less than the income of the previous year; but excluding legacies, larger by $8,450 18.

The number of Bibles and Testaments issued during the past year is 592,432, making a total since the formation of the Society of 7,572,967 copies.

The Managers' Report was read by Rev. Drs. Brigham and Holdich. It showed that a large number of books had been issued during the past year by the Board. A new Diamond 64mo. New Testament, some of copies having also the Book of Psalms appended.

They have also issued a School Testament, of large type, for children and imperfect readers.

Also, a New Testament, of Swedish and English, in parallel columns. A similar Testament, in French and English, is in course of preparation.

They have also completed and issued the Spanish Bible mentioned in the previous Report, conformed to the Hebrew and Greek.

The Book of Genesis and the Book of Acts have been published at the Society's House, in the Grebo tongue, for Western Africa, translated by Rev. Mr. Payne, a Protestent Episcopal Missionary. The Gospel of John is also soon to be printed.

The number of agents employed has been thirty, including two in Texas and one in California, and one, part of the year, in Hayti, W. I.

Grants of books have been made to local Auxiliaries, to Sunday Schools, Seamen, Missionary and other benevolent Societies, and to individuals for distribution at numerous places, at home and abroad, on the land and on the waters. No needy applicant has been sent away empty.

Beside the grants of books, funds have been furnished for publishing the Scriptures in France; also to the Missionary Boards of the Presbyterian, the Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, and Congregational Churches for publishing the same in China.

AMERICAN BAPTIST HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

A business meeting of the Society was held in the basement of the Oliver-st. Church at 3 o'clock P. M. Fifth-day, Rev. Dr. Cone in the chair. Prayer by Rev. Mr. Grinnell of New Jersey. After distributing several copies of the Annual Report, the business of the meeting was gone into. The following abstract shows the condition of the treasury on the 1st of April, 1851:—

Balance from last year's account	$4,965	61
Cash receipts from all other sources	32,119	89
Total amount of cash received for the year ending March 31	$37,685	50
Total amount of disbursements for the same period	33,985	95
Leaving a bal. in the Treas. of	$3,099	55
Amount of liabilities of the Society, March 31, 1851	$25,823	53
Amount of available resources, March 31, 1851	6,339	55
Balance against the Society March 31, 1851	$18,983	98

Of the above amount of receipts, $28,908 28 were in contributions, donations, &c., being an increase over the amount of similar receipts last year of $3,707 19.

One hundred and forty ministers have labored as missionaries or agents of the Society during the past year. Of that number 93 were in commission at the time of making up our last Report—April 1, 1850. The remainder, 47, were new appointments at different periods during the year. Five other missionaries are under appointment, but as their labors do not commence till the 1st of April, they are not enumerated with those above.

Eight who were under appointment some portion of the year need no further aid from the Society.

The distribution of the missionaries has been as follows: In New Hampshire, 1; New York, 3; Delaware, 1; Missouri, 1; Illinois, 32; Indiana, 14; Ohio, 2; Michigan, 18; Wisconsin, 21; Iowa, 14; Minnesota, 3; New Mexico, 1; California, 3; Oregon, 3; Canada, (West) 8; Grand Ligne, 7. Besides which 8 collecting agents have been employed for longer or shorter periods in nearly all the Eastern and Middle States.

The whole number of States, territories and provinces occupied is 15. The number of stations and out-stations supplied is 386, and the aggregate amount of time bestowed upon the field is equal to that of one man for 97 years and eleven months.

The missionaries report the baptism of 981 persons; the organization of 33 churches and the ordination of 37 ministers.

Fifteen houses of worship have been completed and 10 in progress of building.

The mission churches have contributed to the usual objects of Christian benevolence $2,104 97, and about $13,540 in addition to our appropriations for the support of their ministers; besides a large amount for building or repairing their church edifices.

THE ASSOCIATIONS.

As the season approaches for those annual gatherings among us called Associations, we take the liberty to offer a few suggestions.

1. Those who expect to attend as Messengers would do well to look over the Minutes of last year, and refresh their memories. Some things were laid over to be acted on this year. They will be called up, and it will be expected that the brethren will have their minds somewhat matured upon them; especially that the several Committees, to whom important topics have been referred, will have given them as thorough consideration as possible, and not—as is too often the case—when called on to report, be in the awkward predicament of not having given them the first thought. Yet not committees only, but all who expect to take part in the proceedings, should take some forethought about the subjects which are likely to come up for consideration, and be prepared to act from some other principle than the impulse of the moment.

2. The members of the churches, where these convocations are respectively held, should make it their business to be in attendance throughout. Usually, we see but very few of them till the business of the Association is over. On the Sabbath they are present to hear preaching very generally. But it should be borne in mind, that one great object of holding the session of the Association is the benefit of the church where it sits; and that, not merely by means of the Sabbath exercises—for if that were all, the object could be more easily accomplished by sending two or three ministering brethren for the purpose—but by initiating the people into the nature of our denominational business, by making them acquainted with our benevolent enterprises, the degree of success attending them, and so on. It is true, that some of the business of the Association is of a nature somewhat dry and unentertaining. But there is also a great deal done, which ought to be familiar to all, both men and women. Sometimes the special request of a church to have the Association hold its meeting with them, is prompted by the desire that the occasion may be one of benefit to those living in the vicinity. After such a request, and perhaps after more pains taken to get there than would be required in reaching some place a great deal more accessible, it is rather discouraging to find those very people manifest so little interest in it as they often do.

3. To render an Association a season of profit to all, fervant prayer to God is highly necessary. In what manner God controls the human heart, it may not be easy to determine. But nothing is more certain than that the "disposing of the heart, as well as the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord." It is right, therefore, to ask Him to bestow that influence which will purify the heart from its selfishness, destroy the spirit of vain-glory, stubbornness, wrath, debate, and every thing which would tend to throw the deliberations of our Association into confusion. It is right to ask Him for wisdom. He who admonishes us not to lean to our own understanding, is able to make us wise. If we neglect to ask Him for wisdom, He may leave us to see our folly. Let those, therefore, who feel an interest in the cause, pray for the Divine blessing upon our associational gatherings. Let them pray in faith, nothing doubting. God can give such a direction to their proceedings as will be for his own glory, and the advancement of the cause of truth. It is a fault among us, and a very great fault too, that we do not sufficiently rely upon the power of prayer. We trust too much to the efficiency of well-devised plans of operation; and if the anticipated results are not then realized, we are ready to attribute the failure to the imperfection of the plan, and immediately begin to amend it, or to strike out some new one. Hence we are always modifying our plans; and nearly every year witnesses the contrivance of something new to accomplish what has failed hitherto. But the fault is not in the plan, but in the want of a faith's reliance upon Him "who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were." We forget that it is "not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord." Hence, while pretending to work a great deal, we pray but little. God feels himself dishonored, and leaves us to work in the fire.

To the approaching convocations we look forward with some anxiety. When they are over, we shall know somewhat of the state of the denomination at large. We know already the destitution of many of our churches, and the declining state of religion in some of them. We tremble lest there should be such disclosures as indicate that God is departing from us.

The American and Foreign Bible Society.—The 13th Annual Meeting of this Society was held at the Oliver-street Baptist Meeting House in New York, on Sixth-day last, Rev. Dr. Welch presiding. From the Treasurer's Report it appears that the total receipts for the year have been $44,923, and the expenditures $45,729 88. The Annual Report of the Board states that $23,077 has been appropriated for Bible distribution by missionaries in foreign lands. The Society has issued, during the year, 29,045 Bibles, which, when added to 2,554 given to the Edinburgh Society, makes a total of 31,599. Some 10,000 copies of the Danish version of the New Testament are called for just now, which, it is hoped, will be furnished by the society. In regard to the new version question, the report expresses regret, that in the heat of controversy, much unjustifiable language has been used. The Society intends to circulate the present English version of the Scriptures until a better one is made. The opinion is expressed that the new translation should be the work of an independent agency, and that the members of the Society should all be agreed before its publication should be made a Society matter.

POPERY IN WESTERN NEW YORK.

There having been a great number of Roman Catholics in our town the present season, employed upon the New York and Erie Railroad, an excellent opportunity has been given to observe the workings and character of Popery; and I have thought it might be useful to give the following circumstances by way of illustration.

1. There has lived during a part of the winter and spring, in a family in our village, an Irish girl, to whom was presented a copy of the New Testament. On taking it home to her parents, she was ordered to return it to the donor, as she "could not live her religion so easy if she read it."

2. To-day a priest entered the house of another neighbor of mine, for the purpose of visiting a sick man, and performing for him religious service, when a conversation occurred, in which the priest said that the seven golden candlesticks mentioned in the Apocalypse were still burning in heaven. The man of the house replied, that he did not so understand it, but that they represented the seven churches in Asia; to which the priest replied, "You lie, sir." The man repeated his statement, and the priest said again, "You lie, sir." He was then told that he talked like neither a gentleman nor a Christian; to which he again replied as above. Finally, he was told that if he repeated his offensive remark again he must leave the house, whereupon he desisted. I leave it without "note or comment."

THE AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

Agreeable to announcement, the American Anti-Slavery Society met at Syracuse on Fourth-day, May 7, at 10 o'clock. After prayer and singing, Mr. Garrison, the President, spoke at length upon the principles of the Society, and gave the reasons for holding the Annual Meeting in Syracuse instead of the city of New York. He was followed by Gerrit Smith, who presented a resolution, and made a speech, welcoming the Society to Syracuse, expressing full confidence in its integrity, devotion, and usefulness, and tendering to it the fellowship and coöperation of the abolitionists of Central New York. Rev. S. J. May also, on behalf of the city, gave the Society a hearty welcome; and so ended the morning session.

In the afternoon, the Hall was filled, large delegations being present from New England and the Middle and Western States. After the reading of the Treasurer's Report, Mr. May of Syracuse offered a series of resolutions approving the presence of George Thompson in this country, which were the subject of lengthy and eloquent remarks by Edmund Quincy of Boston, Mass., Frederick Douglass of Rochester, N. Y., and a Mr. Cluer of Boston.

MEETING OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions held a meeting at the Tabernacle, in New York, on Sixth-day last. After prayer and singing, the President, Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, made a brief address, showing the steady progress of the missionary work for the last half century. Rev. Sela B. Treat, one of the Secretaries of the Board, then read the following interesting and encouraging statement:—

The missionary year which has just closed may be characterized as one of quiet and thankful progress. Both at home and abroad there has been uniform prosperity.

The receipts of the Board during the nine months of the current financial year have been $186,500, showing an advance of $17,304 upon the corresponding months of the previous year. The advance on donations has been $24,588. A greater increase could have been wished, but we would cherish the hope that this is but the earnest of larger and costlier offerings.

In our schools of Theology there has been a marked and gratifying change. To some of them, indeed, God is evidently granting the self-same spirit which shone forth in the pioneers of American missions.

From October 1, 1850, to May 1, 1851, (seven months,) thirteen (students) received appointments as missionaries to the heathen. During the corresponding poriod of the previous year only four were accepted. The number under appointment at the present time, in this country, is eighteen.

As we turn to the missions, and survey their state and promise, we are cheered on every hand by the evidence of undoubted progress. The reformation among the Armenians of Turkey is pursuing its onward and resistless march. Even the Greeks, in Macedonia, at Athens, and at Constantinople, seem to be slowly awakening from the slumber of ages. Our hopes for the Arab race are constantly brightening. Among "the dwellers in Mesopotamia" we can discern the signs of approaching day. Our young brother at Mosul, happy and hopeful in his work, pleads earnestly for greatly extended operations.

The brethren at Oroomiah are enjoying their third revival in three successive years; another token that we may yet see this ancient church, loved for the father's sake, coming up from the wilderness, leaning upon the arm of the Beloved. The five missions of India have much to animate and encourage them in their labors. The three missions in China have the same open door, the same wide field as heretofore; and at Amoy especially the ingathering has already commenced. Our brother from Borneo will address us this morning in the language of faith and hope.

Among our own aborigines God has not left himself without witnesses to His faithfulness and grace. The Choctaw churches in particular continue to receive the early and the latter rain; and it is believed that no other churches in the world have shared so constantly, for ten years, in the favor of Zion's King. The mission at the Sandwich Islands still finds itself in the strong eddy which shoots out from our Western coast; but it is holding on its way, guided and blessed by the Great Pilot. It is now proposed to commence a new mission, an offshoot from the old, in Micronesia, nearly 4,000 miles farther toward the setting sun. Thus shall we complete our missionary posts around the globe.

But we are admonished by the events of the past year to do with our might, and to do now, what we purpose for a lost world. Six of our brethren and sisters, Mr. Bryant in South Africa, Mrs. Bushnell in West Africa, Mrs. Hamlin among the Armenians, Mr. J. G. Bridgeman at Canton, Mr. Wiley among the Cherokees, and Mr. Hanlock among the Dakotahs, have finished their work, and entered upon their reward. Their fresh graves are so many witnesses, mute but eloquent witnesses—to the heathen of a love that was strong even unto death; witnesses to us of the dignity and excellency of missions, urging us to appropriate, in its living and inworking power, the language of Paul, "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this GRACE given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

The reading of the foregoing statement was followed by brief addresses from Rev. Henry R. Harrington of the Ceylon Mission, Rev. Wm. H. Steele of the Borneo Mission, Rev. William Walker of the West Africa Mission, Rev. Henry Balantine of the Ahmednugger Mission, Rev. Geo. W. Wood of the Mission to the Armenians, and Rev. Dr. Smith.

Mission Premises Burnt.—Letters received last week bring intelligence that the entire premises of the American Baptist Mission at Bangkok, Siam, were destroyed by fire on the night of the 4th of January last, including the buildings of the missionaries. The fire originated in a native house a few rods distant, and spread with such rapidity that very few articles could be saved. The printing office and stock, the building and type foundry, libraries, and nearly all the personal effects of the missionaries, were consumed. The greater part of the second edition of the New Testament was lost, and it was difficult to procure copies enough to conduct the ordinary worship. The total loss was not less than $10,000, and probably considerably more. The missionaries were received into the residence of Senor Marcellino DeAranjo Rosa, the Portuguese Consul, and met with much attention and kindness from others. Mr. Chandler, it is said, will return to this country as soon as possible, to make arrangements for repairing the loss.

Horace Greeley's Voyage to Europe.—The N. Y. Tribune, May 12th, contains a letter from its editor, Horace Greeley, dated at Liverpool, April 28, 1851. He had just arrived by the steamship Baltic, after a boisterous passage of twelve days from New York. His letter is mostly taken up with an account of sea-life and sea-sickness, not at all calculated to excite a roving disposition. "Of every hundred who cross the Atlantic for the first time," so writes Mr. Greeley, "I am confident that two-thirds endure more than they had done in all the five years preceding—more than they would do during two months' hard labor as convicts in a State Prison. Of our two hundred, I think fifty did not see a healthy or really happy hour during the passage; while as many more were sufferers for at least half the time." The Baltic, Mr. Greeley thinks, is one of the quickest, safest and most commodious seaboats in the world, and her management and attendance are as good as the boat.

Protection for Fugitives.—James J. Strang, Mormon Chief of Beaver Isle, in a letter addressed to Gerrit Smith, and published in the Liberty Party Paper, denounces "the new act of Congress for the encouragement of man-stealing," and says that the Mormon community of which he is the head, will afford protection to the fugitives, and "make them heartily welcome." He declares that Beaver Isle and the neighboring islands in lake Michigan would be entirely safe as a place of refuge for oppressed men of color, and that no force can be brought there sufficiently potent to take them away. In addition to this, he says they are founding a colony on Drummond Island (on the American side,) and Clobune's Island, (on the British side,) in Lake Huron, which might be deemed more secure. Each of these Islands is some 100,000 acres in extent.

Southern Rights Convention.—A Convention of some three hundred and fifty persons was held at Charleston, S. C., last week, to consider how Southern Rights may best be protected against Northern Aggression, and whether South Carolina shall now secede from the United States. After talking four days, an Address was adopted, and also a series of resolutions, to the effect that secession, with or without the coöperation of other States, must come; that coöperation, though desirable, is not worth the sacrifice involved in submission; that the right of secession is essential to the sovereignty and freedom of the States; and that the Legislature is looked to for the speedy adoption of measures to exert the sovereign power of the State in defense of its rights.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 10.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. Stillman of New York.

Scene on board the Wreck—Thirty Men rescued on a Raft—Deserted by one of the Boats—Narrow Escape—Short of Provisions—Abandon Thirty Men on the Wreck—Return to Old Providence Island—Inhuman Conduct of Officers—Protest against the Proceedings, and quit the Brig Mechanic.

The brig was broadside on the rocks, and the stern hoisted nearly out, while the bows were down in deeper water. The foremast had gone overboard, and in falling had slipped out of the step, and pried up the deck. The mizzen topmast was standing, with the badges of woe torn and flying at the truck. The jib-boom was entire, and as each sea lifted us, and we came down again upon the rocks, it would bend like a fishing rod, the whole vessel would crack and twist as though it was her dying agony, and the next moment a deluge of water swept her decks and poured over her lee rail. The passengers had crowded the after-house, so that it was almost impassable, and their joy at our arrival was the only agreeable feature in this scene of desolation. Ship's stores, crockery, and every species of valuables, strewed the deck, and the most wanton waste was practiced by men who had been deserted by all officers except a sick second-mate. Each man forgot everything but himself, and the dying were as unattended as the dead. Two of the latter had been thrown overboard as they died, and among the former I recognized a Mr. Wheelock, who was a passenger with me in the Plymouth from San Francisco.

The galley was immediately cut away, and having been battened to keep out the water, was launched overboard, up side down. This was floated over the reef, and made fast to the rocks, and by means of small boats the sick were placed in it. Others were put in as they drew their lots, until it was reported that the flooring was started. Those who were able were kept at work with pails to bail out the water. In the mean time Mr. Suttor stood at the companion-way, with a long knife in his hand, threatening instant death to all who should get in his way, giving to any one the idea, that if he was not born to command it would be difficult to determine what it was for. Capt. H. advised him, and others executed his orders, while Suttor out-roared the surf with his voice, as if to awe the trembling landsmen into the idea that Old Neptune himself had assumed command. Having taken several into the long-boat, with a demijohn of water and a bag of bread, we left the remainder, with the assurance that we would not desert them. While getting from the wreck to the boat, I fell between it and the raft. I thought of the sharks, of a smashing, and got out again, all in the same instant. I was stowed down in the bottom of the long-boat as a superannuated encumbrance—in short, to dispose of myself, I was used up. The sun was nearly setting when we took the house in tow, the jolly-boat leading off. The boat belonging to the wreck was in command of the mate of that vessel, and he requested permission to return to the wreck, to bring off six or seven men, run down to the "Mechanic," and return to our assistance. This was approved, and he was at the same time directed to have lights set for us on the brig, and to bring us a kedge-anchor to hold us in case of any mischance. He returned to the wreck, but instead of men he had filled the boat with plunder.

We continued along the reef by the light of the moon, avoiding the discolored spots, which indicated coral near the surface, until we were nearly to windward of the brig, as she bore by compass before dark, and then squared away to run down before the wind. The house presented a large surface, and we moved rapidly, straining our eyes for the signal lights or the flashes of firearms which were concerted between the two mates, but no boat came. We fired guns continually, but without the satisfaction of an answer. At length we made the lights from the brig, but they were to windward, and we had squared away too soon. Where was the recreant mate? Why had he deserted us? Deep, dark curses went up with the smoke of the gunpowder, and oaths that would have freighted a ship were poured out upon his devoted head. But this would not avail; we were drifting rapidly towards the edge of the bank beyond which an anchor could not save us. We now put our head to the wind; the best men were put to the oars; and every effort was made to hold our own until assistance could reach us. We were broad to leeward of the vessel, and notwithstanding all our exertions, we were falling away fast. So near the brig were we, that we could see her spars looming in moonlight, and we shouted until our voices failed us. We knew they must hear us, and why not send the boat? They did hear us, and watched with painful interest the firing as it flashed farther and farther to leeward; but the boat was not there, and there was no earthly power, so far as they could see, that could save us.

The mate of the Martha Sanger, when he reached the brig, called upon his captain to take the boat back to our assistance; but he was in too safe a place to leave, and offered first ten, then twenty dollars, to any one who would go in the boat. Capt. Lawrence at length finding that no dependence could be placed in these men, got into the boat himself, with two of his men, who were invalids, and pulled away to windward, where the mate told him we were. Not finding us, he returned. Just before reaching his vessel, he saw our signals away to leeward, and as soon as he approached near enough to be heard, he ordered the men to the windlass, and to heave up the anchor—a rash command, which, had it been executed, would in all probability have consigned both brigs' companies to death; for to have extricated her at night from the reef by which she was surrounded, without striking, would have been impossible. It was now suggested, that if the kedge-anchor could be got to the boats, they might be stopped before they were off soundings, and it was immediately sent. In the mean time, as an expedient for checking our stern way, the gun which has been mentioned was fastened to the painter and thrown overboard, and as we passed over a ledge it caught fast. The small boat then went with Capt. H. and Mr. Suttor for the anchor, meeting the boat with Capt. Sisson and Mr. Wolf, whose courage was equal to their humanity, coming to our assistance. Mr. Suttor proceeded on to the brig, and as soon as he had gained the deck, drew his knife, and with the fury of a madman rushed upon the deserter, whom without doubt he would have killed on the spot, had he not fled aloft. No sooner was it thought that we were safe, and the cause of our misfortune understood, than the most general and hearty indignation was expressed, and Mr. Suttor, who rarely did any thing to excite applause, was loudly cheered as he chased the fugitive into the rigging, bellowing the most horrid imprecations. Some proposed to seize him to the rigging and flog him; others were for putting him, with the Captain, in their own boat, with which they had prepared to quit the wreck, and compelling them to find land as best they could; but time calmed the excitement, and they passed unpunished. The boats were employed till a late hour in the night in carrying the men from the raft, and the long-boat, relieved of a part of her load, last of all reached the brig. Once more on the vessel's deck, the warm congratulations of my fellow passengers first made me fully realize the danger through which we had passed.

The next morning the boats were sent again to the wreck, which they reached just before sundown. The vessel had now changed her position, so that it was impossible to get to her with the boats, and the men were compelled to come off in a small boat, made of pieces of the wreck, by means of a line made fast to the rocks. Twenty-one of them were taken off and stowed flat in the bottom of the long-boat. As soon as it grew dark, according to concerted arrangement, I set fire to a preparation of tar and saltpetre on the topgallant forecastle, which gleamed like a light-house over the water, and enabled them to direct their course without a compass, and arrive safe about ten o'clock. An attempt was made the following night, in order to reach the wreck in the morning, but was unsuccessful, owing to the strength of the wind. Several days passed, but no other attempt was made in behalf of those who were left behind.

In the mean time, our stores were nearly gone. Four barrels of bread, loathsome from worms and decay, were all that remained. Of vegetables we had none. The last barrels of pork, beef, and flour, were broached, and this comprised all the food on board, except two live hogs, for the supply of one hundred and sixty men. All the men who had been taken from the wreck, except the Captain and his Mate, were put on the shortest allowance of food and water, and they were crowded on the main deck, or into the damp and filthy hold.

Poor Wheelock, when first taken on board, was delirious, but with a little attention he revived. He sent for me one day, and told me he should never see land again, and wished me to see his friends, tell them his fate, and deliver to them whatever I should find in his pockets, where he said I would find the address of his brother in New York. At length he died, but his brother's address was not found; the Mate took possession of what gold-dust he had, and his body was sewed up in canvas for burial. Thinking that some ceremony was necessary in committing his body to the deep, the Captain obtained a prayer-book, and with a tongue that was more familiar with vulgar blasphemy, read, or attempted to read, the burial service; but after blundering through one sentence, with an air of disgust, he closed the book, and told the men to throw him over. The plank on which he was placed went with the corpse, and the Mate, fearing it would be lost, bawled out in a voice of thunder, "Haul in that plank, G–d d—n it!" and the ceremony was at an end. I looked over the side, where the body lay upon the coral, and saw sharks already gathering to their repast.

At sea, the ship-master is monarch, and Heaven forbid that I should ever again witness the fantastic tricks played by such wretched specimens of tyrants. All the rescued men who had money were compelled to surrender it, and so much of it was taken by the Captain and his Mate as suited their purpose, and from one alone the sum of fourteen hundred and fifty dollars was extorted. This was enough to have entitled the men to some consideration and kindness; but their treatment after this was even more brutal than ever. The poor men had not been permitted to take even a blanket with them from the wreck, and were now not allowed to lie upon the quarter-deck, but confined to the filthy deck, with the hogs, although the most of them were sick, and some dying from the effects of fever and exposure.

The nearest land was Old Providence—a small island sixty miles distant; but as it lay south by west, the wind in going there would be free. Twelve hours would be all the time required to reach it, and as it would now be impossible to reach any port to windward, there might still be time to spend a day or two in efforts for the remaining passengers; but, contrary to all expectation, the order was given to get under way, and with heavy hearts we watched the unfortunate men as our sails filled in the wind, and vanished from their sight. The offer had been made by passengers to bring off the remainder of the men, but the officers, from motives of their own, refused to permit it. It was rumored that it was the intention of the Captain to run down to Providence and land the men taken from the wreck, lay in supplies of fresh provisions, and renew the attempt to reach Serrana. Before noon the lofty summit of Old Providence loomed up from the sea like the distant approach of a thunder-cloud. The mountains and promontories became more distinguishable, and about sun-down we took a pilot, entered the reef, and having passed the bold headland known as "Morgan's Head," dropped our anchor in a most picturesque, lagoon-like harbor, protected on all sides but the west by high mountains, and as smooth as a mill-pond. No boats were allowed to come along side, for fear some man would escape with his money, who had not divided it with our piratical officers. That evening another poor fellow died on the deck.

A Committee was now appointed on the part of the cabin passengers to inquire of the captain what his intentions were in respect to the further prosecution of the voyage. He told them that he had no objections to telling them, but did not wish it mentioned to the other passengers. They replied that the passengers considered that they had a right to know. He then said that he should "go to Serrana, if God spared his life, and he had the vessel under him." We represented to him, that no proper stores could be obtained at this place, and that it was necessary to go to the nearest port. This met only with insolence. The man who had died was prepared to be thrown overboard, when the pilot, who was acting as harbor-master, forbade it, and told the mate he would show them a proper place for burial, upon which the mate burst into a rage, and ordered him off the vessel. The corpse, however, was not thrown overboard. Another young man, in whom we had become interested from his intelligence and gentleness of manners, was lying very ill in the shade of the bulwarks abaft, when the mate drove him off. I told the man to return, and I would speak to the mate to allow him the privilege; but the captain gave orders that none but his own cabin passengers should be allowed to remain aft.

We found a small schooner from Baltimore, the Polly Hinds, Captain Price, ready to start for home, with a cargo of fruit, and she started immediately for the wreck, taking Capt. R. and a couple of reef pilots. I had just time to pen a line to my friends, to tell them that I was still alive, and that I could probably be found in this latitude at any time, as there was no prospect of my getting away—when she glided out by the light of the moon, with three cheers from our passengers.

The next day the rescued men were ordered on shore. An order from the magistrate came off, forbidding any persons in a destitute condition from being landed on the island, or against their consent; but no regard was paid to it, and the men were put on shore, notwithstanding their own remonstrances that they were entirely destitute and sick. One such was sent back by the magistrate, but was driven into a canoe by the violence of the mate, who was upon the point of throwing him overboard. Our determination was now taken, to go on shore, and trust ourselves to the uncertain chances of the climate and an opportunity to get home, rather than be witnesses any longer of such horrible scenes, or trust our lives in such keeping. Capt. Cathcart of Washington, D. C., Capt. Titcomb of Boston, Mass., Capts. Sisson and Wolf of Mystic, Ct., all former ship-masters, and others of us, nine in number, had our baggage put into canoes, and we paddled ashore. The young man that had been driven off from the deck the day before, was provided by the passengers with a place in the folds of the mainsail, but when last I saw him, his eye was fixed, and his tongue incoherent, in the sleep which knows no waking.

It will seem to those who are not familiar with the sea, impossible that such things could be enacted in this day; but I have stated nothing here that I am not only prepared but anxious to prove, before a tribunal that does justice when an opportunity is given it. After going ashore a remonstrance was drawn up, attested before the magistrate. The captain came ashore with his supercargo the next day, armed to the teeth, when the protest was served by an officer of the island. He was very indignant, but, now that he was on shore, respectful, and wished to know if there was any one else who commanded his vessel, and what business it was to those who did not belong to the brig, alluding to several who had disposed of their tickets. The brig having taken a few hundred pounds of yams, squashes, and some fresh meat, went to sea, carrying our unfortunate fellow travelers, who were with us in heart, but whose circumstances would not permit them to leave the brig. We were now alone on this unfrequented and almost unknown little island, only two hundred miles from the port from which we sailed about a month before, with a remote and uncertain prospect of being taken off.

Scientific Association.—The American Association for the Advancement of Science, after a session of several days at Cincinnati, adjourned on Sixth-day last, to meet again at Albany, on the third Monday in August. Eighty-seven members were in attendance, and eighty-seven papers registered, but not all read for want of time. This is said to have been much the best meeting held by the Association. The members were entertained gratuitously, and enough was subscribed by citizens to pay for the publication of the forthcoming volumes.

Presidential Tour.—President Fillmore and most of his Cabinet left Washington on Second-day, May 12th, for a tour through New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. The afternoon of Third-day was to be spent in New York City. On Fourth-day morning, in company with the officers of the Erie Railroad, the Mayor and Common Council, and a number of invited guests, he was to proceed to Piermont, and take the cars for Lake Erie, stopping over night at Elmira, and reaching Dunkirk on Fifth-day in time to take part in the celebration of the completion of the Erie Railroad. He contemplates returning by way of Cincinnati, Wheeling, Pittsburg, and through Pennsylvania.

A New Custom.—Judge Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, before opening Court, calls upon a clergyman for a prayer. At a recent sitting in Winnebago Co., a member of the bar, the Editor of the Oshkosh Democrat, protested against this custom. With all due deference to the Court, he believed that it was but a hypocritical proceeding, and not calculated to impress the bar with any additional reverence. Judge Howe justified himself in dignified language, and proceeded with the business before him.

Governor Johnson, of Pennsylvania, it is said, has not signed the bill repealing the section of the Kidnapping Law of March 3d, 1847, which prohibits the use of the Jails of Pennsylvania for the detention of Fugitives from Labor.

European News.

Three steamships from Europe have arrived since our last. The gist of the news brought by them will be found below.

In England the Easter recess of Parliament gave full leisure to the journals to crowd their columns with the history of the progress of the Great Exhibition. The unpopular move of an opening by the Queen in solitary state, had been abandoned, and 15,000 persons were to be admitted to the spectacle of the inauguration. Cotton has declined, and the market for Colonial produce was dull.

In France the public mind is extremely unquiet. Propositions of all kinds are showered upon the Assembly, by which the authors hope to smooth the rough passages of the coming elections. Louis Napoleon seems not to be enamored of the prospect of privacy to which an election would undoubtedly suffer him to retire.

In Germany the old regime is rapidly restoring itself. Prince Metternich, its incarnation, has returned to Vienna. The ancient German Diet, with some modifications, will doubtless be the result of the dreary congresses and conferences in which the German sovereigns are perpetually engaged.

In Italy there is nothing but a proposed alliance between Southern and Central Italy with Modena and Parma. The plague had appeared in Genoa, supposed to have been communicated by some hides, and five out of eleven cases had proved fatal.

Turkey has sent in a bill to Austria for the maintenance of Kossuth and his companions, adding such curt and crisp complaints of Austrian intermeddling with Turkish affairs, that the Austrian Ambassador has been withdrawn from Constantinople.

The following items are from a letter to the N. Y. Tribune, dated London, April 29:

The royal visitors are arriving for the great Exhibition. The Prince and Princess of Prussia, with Prince William from Berlin, and Prince Henry of the Netherlands, are already here.

The Ottoman steam frigate Teizi Baari has reached Southampton with the Turkish contributions. Several officers of high rank came in her, and on dropping anchor she was saluted by the Platform Battery and by the United States frigate St. Lawrence.

The new Literary Fund project advances. The first performance of the amateur troupe takes place at the Devonshire House. Spectators will be charged five guineas each for admission to the first performance. The comedy will afterward be played in all the large towns of the kingdom, and there cannot be a doubt that the aggregate receipts will greatly assist the promoters in realizing their benevolent designs.

From Ireland we hear of a letter from the Pope, praising and sympathizing with the Irish prelates and people in their bold stand for the Church.

There was recently a broad daylight attempt to assassinate a Mr. Billings, in the County of Meath. He had gone down to collect rent.

The interest in the Great Exhibition is very great in Paris. The Minister of Agriculture and Commerce has issued a circular to the Chambers of Commerce, calling upon them to nominate intelligent ouvriers to be sent to London, partly at the expense of their masters, and partly at that of the Government, to study the Great Exhibition.

A proposal has been made to the government to send the band of the 9th Dragoons to London, during the Exhibition, as a specimen of the military music of France.

A cabinet maker of Vienna, named Leistler, has just left that city for London, taking with him 38 out of the 200 men whom he employs, as well as a number of articles which he has manufactured for the Exhibition. Among them is the furniture of a bedroom and boudoir inlaid with gold and silver, and which is intended as a present from the Emperor of Austria to Queen Victoria. The furniture of the bedroom has cost 120,000, and that of the boudoir 200,000 florins.

In Baden eight members of the Provisionary Government during the insurrection of 1849, were condemned to death on the 23d ult. As none of the accused were present, the sentences were pronounced in contumaciam.

On the 9th the Court-Martial of Piacenza condemned 19 banditti to death, and one to 20 years imprisonment with hard labor. Fifteen of the former were executed immediately; the punishment of the other four was commuted to 20 years of carcere duro.

China News.

By the California mail, which reached New York last week, China news to Feb. 4th was received. It was brought from Hong Kong to San Francisco in 33 days, and was only 62 days from Hong Kong to New York.

The report of the death of the late Commissioner Lin, proves to have been correct.

The disturbances in the interior of China, though serious and widely spread, do not appear to be of a nature to produce any immediate political result that can at all concern foreigners. They seem to extend over the greater part of Hu-nan and Kwangsi, and are reported to have reached to within 120 miles of Canton. The rebels seem to have no political aim, and the continued existence of the rebellion furnishes striking evidence of the lamentable weakness and imbecility of the Chinese Government.

The crew of another American vessel, wrecked at Japan, were recently taken down to Batavia by a Dutch vessel, from Nangasaki. It is supposed that on the arrival at Singapore of an American frigate and a steamer, daily expected, the Hon. J. Halesteir, U. S. Commissioner, will visit the Court of Jeddo, on a mission from the United States. The recent accession of the young Tudoh to the throne, gave rise to a report that Cochin China was again to be the field of that honorable gentleman's diplomatic labors.

On Sunday, the 26th of January, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's vessel Canton, Capt. Jamieson, on her passage from Cumsingmoon to Canton, when about five miles from the anchorage, ran at full speed against a sharp pointed rock, and the hull being of iron, and the formost compartment filling, she sunk entirely by the head, and the boiler fires were put out. She was expected to be raised and repaired speedily.

A RIFLE FOR THE WORLD'S FAIR.—Mr. Henry Cromwell, of Ohio, has exhibited to us, says the N. Y. Tribune, a superb specimen of a rifle which he is taking to the World's Fair, where it will be presented to the Emperor Nicholas, of Russia. It is known as Gross' Repeating Rifle, and was made at the manufactory of Henry Gross, at Tiffin, Ohio. The workmanship is exquisite; the stock is of black walnut, elegantly polished, and the lock, sliding chamber, and barrel of the finest steel. Each chamber is provided with three charges. A slight pressure of the finger brings each charge in succession before the trigger, and the aperture is so guarded as to prevent more than one being discharged at a time. The barrel may be unscrewed and the whole rifle packed in a light case, capable of being carried in a trunk or valise.

TELEGRAPH DISPATCH.—The steamship Europa reached her wharf in New York on Tuesday at 6½ A. M. Her news was at the O'Reilly Telegraph Office, 181 Broadway, before 7, previous to the office being opened. The Pittsburgh office got to work about 8 A. M., and the dispatch commenced going to New Orleans 10 minutes past 8, and was received and put up in the Exchange before 9 A. M., and the acknowledgment of its receipt reached the O'Reilly Telegraph Office, New York, at 11¼—thus having traveled from New York to New Orleans and back in three hours and five minutes. The distance between New York and New Orleans, following the track of the telegraph lines, is about 2,000 miles, and may somewhat exceed that distance. [Tribune.

BEAUTIES OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.—Another troublesome question is on the carpet, in connection with the salvation of the Union by means of the Fugitive Slave Law. A slave woman ran away from Maryland to Pennsylvania, and while there, living in the enjoyment of freedom, had a child. This child being a native of a free State is thereby free, but being the offspring of a slave mother according to the laws of slavery is a slave. The mother was reclaimed into slavery, and the child was carried back with her, but the authorities of Pennsylvania contend that it must be restored to freedom, and this claim, as we understand, will be argued before the Supreme Court.

COLORED DELEGATES TO EUROPE.—The colored people of Allegany County, Penn., have appointed Charles Lenox Remond of Salem, Mass., and Robert Purve of Byberry, Penn., delegates to Europe, to lay before the assembled millions at the great World's Fair the condition of the colored population of the United States under the provisions of the infamous Fugitive Slave Bill, to ask of the enlightened nations an expression of disapprobation against the cruelty and oppression now being waged against them—such an expression as shall be both felt and respected.

SUMMARY.

A dispatch dated Boston, Friday, May 9, says: T. P. Smith, the colored man who was attacked by a gang of negroes on Wednesday night, with intent to tar and feather him on account of his opposition to a plan for the mixture of white and black children in the public schools, was again last night decoyed from his school into Market square, where seven or eight blacks awaited him. They knocked him over with a slung-shot, and were only stopped in further outrages by the appearance of the watch.

The express train coming east, Saturday afternoon, when about six miles from Utica, ran over John Cantwell, a grocery keeper at Frankfort, and instantly killed him. He had been to Utica to purchase goods, and was returning on the railroad track, when he saw the up emigrant train coming, and stepped from that track to the other, upon which the express train, unbeknown to him, was just then coming. He was thrown by the locomotive about ten feet, into a ditch. He leaves a family residing in Utica.

Mr. H. Underhill, of Canandaigua, this State, has invented and taken means to secure a patent for a new printing press, which is thought to be capable of throwing off sheets at the rate of 600 per hour, employing only a man and a boy. It is supposed that one man alone can work 400 sheets an hour. The connections are extremely simple for the advantages it possesses, and the whole, including roller molds and all the necessary appendages for the press, can be profitably constructed for $400.

Hon. Samuel R. Thurston, Delegate to Congress from Oregon Territory, died on the 29th March, on board the steamer California, bound from Panama to San Francisco. He had complained of illness at various times since leaving New York, but was not considered in a dangerous state till the day preceding his death. His disease was dysentery. His remains were taken to Acapulco for interment. Dr. Gwin, U. S. Senator from California, was also ill on board the same steamer, though not dangerously.

Almira Beasly, a girl of 16, was recently examined in Providence, R. I., on a charge of poisoning her brother, only 15 months old, by giving him arsenic. One witness testified that the accused confessed to her that she gave arsenic to both the boys and her other sister; that she was a professed medium of spiritual rappings; that she bought the poison with money obtained of those who came to witness the spiritual rappings; and that her mind had not been right since she became a medium. She was fully committed for trial for murder.

President Fillmore, accompanied by Secretaries Webster, Stuart, Graham, and Mr. Hall, Postmaster-General, left Washington on Monday for this city, to be present at the formal opening of the New York and Erie Railroad. They will go through to Dunkirk with the Directors and invited guests, and participate in the celebration at that place. They will be absent from the Capital for a week or ten days.

The Oregonian announces the discovery, by Captain George Drew, of a vein of coal on the Cowlitz River, Oregon, 18 miles from its junction with the Columbia, and about one mile from the main Cowlitz. The vein is two feet thick and about half a mile in width, fifteen feet above high water mark, and about forty feet below the surface of the bluff mountain. Governor Ogden, of the Hudson Bay Company, at Vancouver, sent a boat and crew to bring a quantity away, that it may be fairly tested.

A deplorable accident took place yesterday afternoon, says the N. O. Picayune, April 29th, about one o'clock, at Carrollton. As a skiff, in which were Dr. Logan, of that place, his three sons, and five negroes, was crossing from the opposite side of the river, it came in contact with a raft, and instantly capsized. The five negroes and two of the Doctor's sons were drowned; the Doctor and his remaining son were saved.

It is not known how the disease was communicated to them.

An intelligent correspondent of the Mississippi Flag of our Union, writing from San Francisco, says: "It is a wide-spread impression here, that California will become a slave State upon the exhaustion of the surface gold mines; for negroes alone can be relied on for the heavy work of crushing quartz and the frequent emergencies of agricultural pursuits."

Some twelve years ago a mulatto woman, now claimed as the property of Mr. Ferry, of Franklin, Ky., was, by consent of a former owner, taken to and detained in Pennsylvania some seven months, contrary to the statute of that State, which abolished slavery there, and which allowed sojourners to retain slaves within the State, as personal attendants, only six monts. She prosecuted for her freedom a short time since, on these grounds, and the Court of Kentucky gave her a favorable decision.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. EDWARDS, E. A. PARK, and M. STUART, of Andover; Dr. ROBINSON and H. B. SMITH, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has beee received in the short time which has elapsed since the union was made public, and the universal approbation of the measure which the publisher is daily receiving through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

TERMS.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the BIBLIOTHECA SACRA, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf with marbled edges, at $25 00.

☞ Orders should be addressed to

Miscellaneous.

Calmness in View of Death.

Mrs. Thompson had been but about a year at her post, when she was struck down by the cholera in its recent fearful visitation of Jamaica. The following account of her last hours, shows how resignedly the Christian can die, even when life seems most desirable:—

It was most consoling to those around her to witness with what calmness she met the approach of death. On being asked by Mr. Thompson if she was afraid to die, she said, "No; but I may get over this." On being told that her case was a very serious one, she said, "All things are in the hands of the Lord. He can raise me up; if not, I trust I can say, His will be done. He has led me by a way that I knew not. He took my father and mother when I was young; then my other stay," alluding to her brother; "but afterwards he raised you up to me, and short though the time has been, we have been very happy together. He brought us from our home and placed us in his own vineyard; it was my desire to have labored for him, although I felt my own insufficiency." Mr. Thompson said, "I hope you can say, you know in whom you have believed." "Yes. For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Mr. Thompson said, "The parting between us will be but short; and if God should be pleased to separate us now, I hope we shall soon again meet in another and better world." She answered, "I hope that you will be spared to enjoy a long life and to be the instrument of leading many to see the way of salvation. But truly we know not what a day may bring forth. I rose yesterday in health; to-day I am on my death-bed. Oh! for faith to trust Him." The twenty-third Psalm was then read to her; and on being asked what part was sweetest, she said, "He maketh my cup to run over; goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life." A friend present said, "It is better to depart and to be with Christ." She replied, "Yes; whom have I in heaven but thee; and there is none on earth that I desire besides thee."

Prof. Page's Electro Locomotive.

Agreeably to public announcement, says the Washington Republic, of April 30th, Prof. Page yesterday, at one o'clock in the afternoon, made another trial of his Electro-Magnetic Locomotive. The progress of the locomotive when it started was so slow that a boy was enable to keep pace with it for several hundred feet. But the speed was soon increased, and Bladensburgh, a distance of, we believe, about five miles and a quarter, was reached in 39 minutes. When within two miles of that place, the power of the battery being fully up, the locomotive began to, run, on nearly a level plane, at the rate of 19 miles an hour, or 7 miles faster than the greatest speed heretofore attained. This velocity was continued for a mile, when one of the cells cracked open, which caused the acids to intermix and, as a consequence, the propelling power was partially weakened. Two of the other cells subsequently met a similar disaster. The Professer proceeded cautiously, fearing obstructions on the way, such as the coming of cars in the opposite direction and cattle on the road. Seven halts were made, occupying in all forty minutes. But, notwithstanding these hindrances and delays, the trip to and from Bladensburg was accomplished in one minute less than two hours. The cells were made of light earthen ware, for the purpose of the experiment merely, without reference to durability. This part of the apparatus can therefore easily be guarded against mishap. The great point established was, that a locomotive on the principle of Professor Page can be made to travel nineteen miles an hour. The facts strengthen the opinion which we have heretofore expressed, that success in the application of electro-magnetism propulsion of railway trains can scarcly any longer be considered as doubtful.

Bold and Accomplished Rascals.

The Cairo (Illinois) Sun relates that two men recently stopped at the store of Mr. Dishon, in Jonesborough, Union Co., in that State, and requested permission to place a box which they had in their wagon in his house for the night. Mr. D. at first objected, but finally consented to take the box in his store room. The men then put up their horses for the night. Early on the next morning they had their wagon at the door of the store to get the box and start away from the town. Mr. Dishon missed a bolt of broadcloth from his counter, and on further examination found that $500 had been taken from his desk drawer during the night. He then refused to let the men have the box until it was examined. They swore that they would have the box, and as they rushed forward to take it, Mr. D. stepped out of the door and locked them in. Having obtained assistance the door was opened and the men arrested. On opening the box a stout, daring looking man sprung out, and the missing cloth and money, and some silk and a dark lantern were found in the bottom. The fellow pretended to turn "State's evidence," and declared he had long sought an opportunity to leave the other men; that to leave them voluntarily would have brought their deadly vengeance upon him; that he had never been detected before; that he remained with them only because he was compelled to do so to preserve his life; that there were now six hundred men in the United States engaged in the same business; and that the last time he was at the general money depositation the company had over fifteen bushels of silver and gold. He would not be put in the same room with the two accomplices, fearing they would kill him. The two men swore to the officers that it was folly to put them in jail, for they had money and friends, it would take at least one hundred well armed men to guard them, and notified them that they could not possibly be detained three weeks.

Liability of Newspaper Subscribers.—Liability of subscribers to newspaper and periodicals is not, perhaps, in many cases, duly considered. A case has recently been decided which will awaken attention to the subject. Mr. Jasper Harding, of Philadelphia, not long since recovered a large sum ($120,) for a subscription to the Pennsylvania Inquirer, of a man residing in Rhode Island. The circumstances were these—the subscriber took the paper for some time and then sent the publisher notice of discontinuance, without forwarding the money for qayment. The publisher took no notice of this, nor of several subsequent notices of refusal to take the paper from the post-office. The result was, that, notwithstanding the Rhode Islander did not receive the paper for several years, yet he was forced to pay Mr. Harding the whole amount up to the period claimed in the bill. Were the laws enforced more frequently in cases of delinquent subscribers of long standing, such heavy losses would not so often accrue to publishers. An occasional example may have a good effect.

Lead Poisons.

M. Flaudin, of Paris, gave an account to the Academy of the result of a series of experiments undertaken by him, with a view of ascertaining the effects produced by oxide of zinc, carbonate of lead and sulphate of lead, on the animal economy.

As no experiments had yet been undertaken to determine the question whether the manufacture or use of oxide of zinc was divested of all injurious consequences to the animal economy, and as some persons had stated that the slow and repeated absorption of zinc was as injurious as that of lead, M. Flaudin determined to settle the question by having recourse to the following experiments:—

Some years since, M. de Roulz proposed to substitute sulphate of lead for carbonate of that metal, in painting, &c. He considered that as the sulphate was a more insoluble and stable compound than the carbonate, therefore it would be less readily absorbed and assimilated by the system. M. Flaudin having been consulted by M. Roulz on the subject, first tried the effect of sulphate of lead on animals. In order to place the animals operated upon, as much as possible, in the same relative condition as the workmen employed in the manufacture and use of white lead, he made use in each case of frictions on the skin. He took a dog, and having shaved off the hair, rubbed in every day, four or five grammes of an ointment composed of equal parts of sulphate of lead and lard. After the tenth day the effect of the poison became evident, and the dog died on the twenty-second day. Less than sixty grammes, or two ounces, of the sulphate of lead had been employed in the frictions. A chemical analysis of the body indicated the presence of lead, especially in the liver. A second dog was treated in exactly the same manner, and four or five grammes of an ointment composed of oxide of zinc and lard, was rubbed in every day. Ten, twenty, thirty days passed, and although the ointment was applied every twenty-four hours, the dog's health did not undergo the least alteration. The experiment was stopped when about 70 grammes of the ointment had been used. For ten days afterwards the dog was allowed to remain untouched, after which he was submitted to the action of an ointment composed of equal parts of white lead and lard used in the same proportions as the sulphate of lead and oxide of zinc. At the expiration of ten days the dog sickened and refused his food; gradually all the symptoms of poisoning appeared, and the animal died on the twenty-third day, sixty grammes of the carbonate of lead having been used.

These experiments incontestibly prove that the compounds of zinc do not exert any pernicious influence on the animal economy, and that the sulphate and carbonate of lead are both injurious. [Scientific American.

A Balloon Excursion.

Mr. Charles Green and the Duke of Brunswick recently left Hastings, England, in a large balloon, en route for Boulogne. The balloon retained a southeasterly course till about twelve miles from the English shore. The wind then carried them southward. When somewhat short of mid-channel, the balloon was almost becalmed, and took a low level, so that by means of a speaking trumpet the occupiers of the car could converse with the crews of some fishing boats. On getting further from the English coast, the balloon again got into a current setting to the south-east. The gas at this period became much expanded by the action of the sun's rays, and the voyagers ascended to a hight of 4,000 feet. The safety valve at the bottom then began to act, owing to the great expansion of the gas, and the escape which ensued caused a gradual descent, till the appendages to the guide-line, consisting of three logs of wood, came upon the water. The grapnel was attached to two metallic air vessels, sufficient to enable it to float upon the water, and bladders of air were provided to be attached to the grapnel line, to aid it in floating. Two men who attempted to catch the grapnel as it was trailing along the sands, were thrown violently upon the ground. An easy descent was made shortly after 6 o'clock, upon a hill near Neufchatel, about ten miles southwest of Boulogne. The voyage occupied about five hours and a half, while the distance traversed is supposed to have been sixty miles.

Cure for Potato Rot.—J. T. Snyder of Franklin, New Jersey, made application on the 21st ult., to the Secretary of the State for the premium offered by the Legislature of Massachusetts for a reward for the discovery of a remedy for Potato Rot. His remedy is described as follows: "At the period when the potaote rot usvally commences, scatter a handful of ashes around the vines on each hill, and it will effectually prevent the disease The application should be made as late as possible."

An Afflicting Casuality.—On Thursday afternoon about 6 o'clock, as the sloop Meridan, of Castleton, was coming up the river, opposite Barrytown, the wind suddenly shifted, causing her to upset almost instaneously. Mrs. Van Buren, (the wife of the Captain,) and her sister were in the cabin at the time, and before they could get out the vessel filled with water, and they were drowned. One of the hands was also drowned.

Young Navigators.—An Irish woman of East Boston, who went out to work during one of the days of the storm, found, when she returned, that her house was partly under water. As she had left two children in the house, she was in a state of fearful anxiety. When an entrance into the house was affected, they were both found sitting in a cradle which was floating about the room.

A Thousand Distilleries.

Reader, did you ever sit down and endeavor to count up the effects of one single small distillery? The man who erected it years ago is probably gone to the drunkard's grave. His aged wife sits, a melancholy woman, bowed with sorrow, on a large chair, from which she is scarcely able to rise without assistance, and rehearses the sad tale, which tells of one son slain in a fight of drunkards, of another dying a bloated thing on his low bed, and then whispers her fears that the remaining one, who attends to the farm and the "still," is going the same way. A widowed daughter whose husband nourished an appetite for brandy by potations from the same fount, is her companion, and amid the cares and toils imposed by half a dozen small children, has her heart often wrung by the recollection of early disappointment. One negro after another has fallen away under the influence of cider and brandy; the graves of the dead under the old oak are more numerous than the living, and likely soon to be in a still greater majority, for scarce one upon the place is a sober person. Each receives drams every day from the hand of the inebriated young master, or steals them from the carelessly fastened cellar. No laborer on the place does half the work he ought. Every thing is out of joint—the fences falling down, the land grows poorer. Besides the consequences of the distillery at home, it has the witnesses of its work elsewhere; for once, if not now, a large quantity was yearly manufactured for sale, and God only knows how many it slew as it went streaming through the neighborhood and abroad into the land. And yet there are one thousand distilleries in Virginia, and hundreds of them do forty times the work of the little one above described. And men, who tell us they love their country, their fellow-men, and their God, make, buy and sell, and drink. See yonder healthy, good-looking man; he has the appearance of one well to do in the world, and he is so. Observe him; you take him from his countenance to be a person of benevolent intentions, and will form, perhaps, a still higher opinion of him when I tell you that he is a regular attendant at church, prays in public often, and puts as much into the box for the poor as any one. Let us go to the meeting on Sabbath at his church; there he is, on the front bench, close to the pulpit; he sings; at the invitation of the minister, he prays; and, it being communion day, he rises from his seat at the appointed time, and with solemn air aids in distributing the bread and wine. After the services are over, the minister goes with him home, and we know that he will find a plentiful board, and a hearty welcome. But let us, too, go to our home. But what sounds are these, that salute us on the road, a few miles from the church?—Men in loud talk, cursing—wicked songs—shouts! Whence do they proceed? Ah! I see there is a crowd in the back yard of yonder little house, pitching and playing marbles. But, hark! the noise increases—they quarrel surely! Yes—see! see! they fight!—three! four! six!—all together! Rocks are flying about! Several are bloody! Let's summon a magistrate; Mr. ——, the good man, with whom the minister turned off at the road a few rods back, is one; let's gallop after him. We've got him, but he comes so slowly that the combatants have spent their strength, and are nearly quiet when he arrives. But what is that the keeper of the groggery is saying to him? "Mr. ——, you see what a row the boys have been in to-day; but don't blame me, the barrel of brandy I bought at your distillery is rather too strong for them." 'Tis not the first that Mr. —— has sold to that customer; nor is it the first Sabbath, by many, on which, while Mr. —— has prayed and sung, and looked up to heaven at the church, the same scene of violence and blood has been transpiring here. And yet there are one thousand distilleries in Virginia, and hundreds of them are owned by men who go to church to pray and sing, while their liquor goes to do the work of Satan. Yea, more; and while the wholesale Christian merchants in Richmond and elsewhere go to church on the Sabbath with their hymn-books, there to listen and to discourse of heavenly things, and to raise their eyes upward as if ready to rise to the mansions of bliss. Why, at those small shops in the city's suburbs and counties far and near, their liquor is streaming into the throats of degraded white men and degraded negroes; and borne upon the same Sabbath air that bears their prayers and songs, go forth oaths, and words of wrath, and the sound of heavy blood-drawing blows; and the whiskey and brandy fall so low in the retailer's barrels, that the busy little tradesman will be off to-morrow to the city for a fresh supply, and to get at the wholesale store of our Christian brother; and then, when next Sabbath rolls around, there will be more prayers at the church in town, and more curses at the shops in the suburbs and in the country; and if the wholesale dealer is one nearer heaven, why the retailer's customers will be one week farther from it; and if the wholesale dealer's profits in a week have added comfort to his family, so within the retailer's districts, comfort had diminished in many a house, the cloud of sorrow has thickened on many a woman's brow and the aching at her heart increased; and the portion of many a child has been curtailed.

Alas! alas! that there should be one thousand distilleries, and as many wholesale sellers of whiskey and brandy and other liquors in Virginia; and that men who pray for the peace of Jerusalem, and the salvation of men, should be employed for six-sevenths of their time in sending out an agent to rob the church and the world of the good that is in them! Alas! that patriots, who speak and assemble to legislate for the mental and moral improvement of the people, should encourage, by private example, the use, sale, and manufacture of that which breeds vice and ignorance! Let no man wonder that there are 60,000 grown persons in Virginia who can neither read nor write, and some one or two hundred thousand indigent children who are crying to the State for education, when patriots and Christians combine to deprive the fathers in the land of the power and the will to provide for their offspring. The Rum Houses Ninety Years Ago.

The late Ex-President John Adams, in his "Diary" now first published by his grandson, the Hon. C. F. Adams, about ninety years ago thus recorded his opinion of rum, and of Rum Houses, viz:—

PUBLIC HOUSES.

"Indeed scarcely anything that I have observed in the course of a long life has a greater influence on the religion, morals, health, property, liberties and tranquillity of the world;—I mean public houses. The temper and passions, the profaneness and brutal behavior, inspired by the low sort of company that frequent such houses, and by the liquors they drink there, are not very compatible with the pure and undefiled religion of Jesus,—that religion whose principle is to renounce all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness. That inattention to the public ordinances of religion, as well as to private devotion which I have reason to think so prevalent in these times is no unnatural consequence of the very general resort to these licentious houses. The plentiful use of spirituous liquors begins with producing a strange confusion of mind, appetites and passions, too violent for the government of reason, proceeds to involve men in debts, and of consequence in lying, cheating, stealing and sometimes in greater crimes; and ends in total and incurable dissolution of manners."

* * * * *

"Thousands and thousands are every year expiring in Europe, and proportionable numbers in this country, the miserable victims of their own imprudence and the ill policy of rulers in permitting the cause of their ruin to exist. Allured by the smell of these infernal liquors, like the ghost in romances allured by the smell of human blood, they resort to these houses, waste their time, their strength and their money, which ought to be employed in the management of their own affairs and families, till, by degrees, much expended, little earned, they contract habits of carelessness, idleness and intemperance; their creditors demand, they promise to pay, but fail; writs issue, charges are multiplied for the maintenance of others as idle as themselves, and executions strip them of all they have, and cast their miserable bodies into loathsome prisons.

The number of these houses has been lately so much augmented, and the fortunes of their owners so much increased, that the artful man has little else to do but secure the favor of taverners in order to receive the suffrages of the rabble that attend these houses, which in many towns within my observation, makes a very large, perhaps the largest number of voters."—Diary of John Adams.

From the Spirit of the Age.

Intemperance Hereditary.

Of the many astounding truths concerning the effects of Alcohol upon the human system, which have been brought to light by medical skill and observation, there is not one, perhaps, which has been received with so little credulity, as the doctrine that drunkenness is hereditary—that it is imparted from parents to children. By most persons, the idea is regarded as the offspring of over-enthusiastic minds, rather than a well attested truth, corroborated by the evidence of the most celebrated Physicians both of the old and new world. Nor is the doctrine a novel one, but comes to us sanctioned by the experience of antiquity—Thus Plutarch says—"One drunkard begets another"—and Aristotle remarks that drunken women bring forth children like unto themselves." And Dr. Browne, a distinguished Physician of a later day, makes the following statement: "The drunkard not only enfeebles his own system, but entails mental disease upon his family. His daughters are nervous and hysterical; his sons are weak, wayward, eccentric, and sink insane under the pressure of excitement of some unforeseen exigency, or of the ordinary calls of duty. This heritage may be the result of a ruined and diseased constitution, but is much more likely to proceed from long continued nervous excitement, in which pleasure was sought in the alternate exaltation of sentiment and oblivion, which exhausted and wore out the mental powers, and ultimately produced imbecility and paralysis, both attributable to disease of the substance of the brain. How far the monomania of inebriety is itself a disease, and may be more the development, the consummation, than the commencement of a hereditary tendency to derangement, this is not the place to point out; but there is every reason to believe that it not only acts upon, and renders more deleterious, whatever latent may exist, but vitiates or impairs the sources of health for several generations. That the effects of drunkenness are highly inimical to a permanent, healthy state of the brain, is often proved at a great distance of time from the curse of intemperance and long after the adoption of regular habits. Some time since I was called upon to treat a remarkably fine boy about sixteen years old, among whose relations no case of derangement could be pointed out, and for whose sudden malady no cause could be assigned except a single glass of spirits. His father, however, had been a confirmed drunkard, was subjected to fits of delirium and depression, following inebriety, and died of dilirium tremens. The boy recovered. His case presented many points of interest. His head increased rapidly and the two hemispheres were of an equal size. The disease was intermittent, the patient passing a week in incoherent madness, and the succeeding week in tranquillity and consciousness. These states were separated or connected by short profound sleep or lethargy, differing altogether from the patient's ordinary sleep, and recognized by him as the culminating point of his order. At present I have two patients who appear to inherit a tendency to unhealthy action of the brain from mothers addicted to drinking; and another, an idiot, whose father was a drunkard." Dr. Howe, in his Report to the Legislature of Massachusetts on idiocy, says, the parents of the 300 idiots in the hospital are, "known to be habitual drunkards." Such parents, it is affirmed, give a weak and lax constitution to their children, who are predisposed by their very organization, to have cravings for alcoholic stimulants; and Dr. Carpenter says such children are "especially prone to intemperate habits."

And yet many are disposed to look on this doctrine as an absurdity, and say that the intemperance of the children of drunken parents is solely attributed to the example every day set before them. While we willingly yield that wicked examples have a direful tendency upon the young, we cannot see why it is that the drunkard cannot impart this constitutional ailment to his offspring as well as any other. Children partake of the tempers, dispositions and ways of their parents in other particulars, and why not in this? The best of medical writers of the present day, term intemperance a disease! and cannot a disease be communicated? The "disease," says Dr. Carpenter, "does not consist in the mere act or habit of becoming intoxicated, but in the irresistible impulse which drives the unhappy being to do what he knows to be pernicious and wrong, and which in the intervals of his paroxysms, he views with loathing and disgust.

With these facts staring them in the face, how can heads of families tamper with that which is sowing the seeds of disgrace, disease and death in the life-blood of their own children? Verily, they who do so in the face of light and knowledge, must have a terrible account to give for the misery and ruin they may entail upon the world. Parents! we beseech you, if you have no regard for yourselves, spare, oh, spare the innocent unborn who are yet to come after you and entail not upon them the drunkard's disease.

Advance in England.

In the last Half Century, now just closed, the British people have doubled the number and tonnage of their ships—from 18,000 vessels to probably 36,000, and from 2,000,000 to 4,000,000 tons. A single steam-ship, the Comet, paddled in the Clyde in 1811, and to-day our 1,500 steamers smoke on every navigable river and lake, and everywhere on the world-encircling sea. In 1801 our imports were worth £32,000,000, and in 1849, £59,000,000; our exports were £25,000,000, and are now nearly £60,000,000. We produced 250,000 tons of iron in 1806, and 2,000,000 in 1849. We consumed 56,000,000 lbs. of cotton, and now the consumption is 775,500,000 lbs. Meanwhile the import of flax has doubled itself. The value of the real property in England was estimated at £995,000,000, and now it is estimated at £2,000,000,000. The increase of religious, benevolent, and learned societies, shows strikingly that this vast wealth is neither illiterate, inhuman, nor godless.

The average duration of life has been doubled by the progress of medical science and of wiser habits. Vice has diminished. Enormous as the consumption of alcoholic poisons socially and convivially still is, a revolution has taken place regarding them during the half century. Dr. Thomas Chalmers told me that, in his youth, in Fifeshire, it used to be the common eulogium at funerals on the defunct who came up to the conventional standard of society—"Ah! he was a good man, and a fair drinker." Now a drunken gentleman is a rarity. Clubs have superseded taverns, and even the ladies will, on reflection, acknowledge the change is an improvement, however anti-matrimonial the clubs may be.—Standard of Freedom.

No Wine at the Party.

Mrs. Gossamer might turn up her pretty nose and exclaim, "How ridiculous to think of having a fashionable party without wine!" Mr. Addlepate, who aims to secure attention and admiration by the questionable ornaments of his upper lip and chin, might echo "ridiculous!" and the rubicund visage of the portly consumer of turtle soup and brandy, might be flushed with disappointment and a little fashionable wrath if the wine was not forthcoming; and even the Hon. Mr. —— be heard to mutter in an under tone some awful words about "fanaticism, ultra ism, and plebeian economy." This certainly would never do. The family would lose caste by such a violation of the courtesies of life, and therefore the wine must continue to flow. The sons share the festivities and the wine. The dreadful appetite of the drunkard is thus created, and when the eldest born is laid in his own hair in a drunkard's grave, the wretched parents return to their desolate home, revive their fainting spirits with a glass of wine, and talk with consoling friends of "the afflictive dispensations of God's Providence." Their talk should be of the deplorable results of fashionable folly and dissipation. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap," says the word of God. That and not another thing. The sower of thistle seed must not expect to harvest wheat from the soil thus sown. Many of the wealthy and influential families of Boston have been for the last quarter of a century sowing the seed of dissipation in the virgin soil of their children's habits, and they are now gathering a harvest of desolation and tears. It is a natural crop from such sowing.—Dr. Jewett.

West Indies---Good Testimony.

In a sermon recently preached by the Rev. Thomas A. Brown, Rector of Charlotte parish, St. Vincent, the preacher said--

I openly ridiculed total abstinence societies, and verily believed that those who joined them were well-meaning, but mistaken persons. Time, however, and experience, have fully convinced me, that these societies are of vast importance to the temporal and spiritual welfare of every country in which they are established; that they are superior to all the laws that ever were, or ever can be enacted; that they have been, under the superintending blessing of providence, the means of doing good, where all other means have failed; that they are worthy the attention of every clergyman, and every Christian; and that the pulpit, no less than the platform, is a fit and proper place to set forth the incalculable benefits they have conferred upon mankind.

Among the conditions of contract for baking bread and biscuits for the army and navy in Barbadoes, it is stipulated that "No spirituous liquors are to be sold in or about the bakehouse or premises. The contractor to engage to pay the sum of £20, sterling, by way of penalty to the crown in the event of any spirituous liquors being sold therein."—West Indian.

Grand Jury Presentment.

☞ The following is an extract from a late Presentment of the Grand Jury of Philadelphia:

"The Grand Inquest are impressed with the belief that the great increase of the number of houses licensed for the purpose of retailing liquors in the city and county, growing out of the provisions of the late law for licenses for houses of that description, is a serious and growing evil; the increase of consumption of spirituous liquors, and consequent intemperance of the thoughtless and vicious classes of society, is the result of temptations placed in their way, and the facility with which the article can be obtained. They would remark, in addition, that a large number of the houses licensed cannot possibly afford accommodation to either travellers or strangers, thus demonstrating that they may be termed grog-shops of the lowest cast.

"The Grand Inquest are not prepared to suggest a remedy for these evils, but they believe that the present law might be so amended or modified as to guard against these, as well as the evils which its enactment was intended to remedy. There is no doubt on the minds of the Grand Inquest, that many of the cases which they had in review before them, had their origin in intemperance."

Temperance in Oswego.

We learn from the Cayuga Chief, that the temperance men of Oswego, or rather some fifteen of them, met a short time before their local election, to deliberate upon the temperance aspect of the neighborhood, and whether it was possible to make any impression on the coming election. They finally determined to nominate an independent temperance ticket, scarcely hoping even to distract the old parties; when, to their joyful surprise, they elected nearly the whole ticket; beat the whigs out and out; and the democrats only gained one on them, and he a temperance man. So much for testing public opinion on the subject.

We learn also from the same paper, that at the recent election in the towns around Auburn, wherever whig officers have been elected, it has been owing to the temperance vote. Even in Mentz, the strong-hold of Democracy, the Whigs have elected a supervisor, through the temperance vote. Let this be a warning to the parties that hope to triumph. There are men, and their increasing numbers are encouraging, who hold moral principles above political connections. Let politicians think of this, and make their nominations accordingly.—Express.

First Temp. Missionary Vessel.

The New York Tribune contains a notice of the arrival at West Africa, of the first missionary vessel which has ever sailed without taking rum as part of the cargo. Former missionaries have protested against such a manifest contradiction, but without effect, and have been obliged to sail in such vessels, or give up their voyage. The owner of the above brig had decided to take rum against the earnestly expressed wishes of the eight missionaries who intended to go in her. He persisted in refusing, until it was fortunately ascertained that the rum would pay no profit.

The voyage was agreeable to all, regular Sabbath services were held, and a Bible class was attended to, twice a week, in which the Captain and his crew uniformly took part.

The reported decrease of the slave trade may call for less use of rum, and our missionaries, henceforth, be able to obtain passages in thorough-going temperance vessels.

Russia.

The spirit duties produce a very large sum. In Russia, properly so called, government reserves to itself a monopoly of distillation; but in the rest of the empire, the produce of the distilleries, which any one may construct, is subjected to an excise duty. The consumption of spirits is very large, exceeding 80,000,000 gallons annually, and the revenue thence arising may be estimated at 100,000,000 dollars. Among their other privileges the nobility may distil all the spirits required for their establishments free of duty.—National Temperance Magazine.

Father Mathew's Old Particular.—There is raised and manufactured in the Missouri, according to the New Orleans True Delta, a species of wine of so peculiar a nature, that "unpleasant effects are never experienced from the use of this wine, no matter how large a quantity may be imbibed, the stomach and the head giving on the succeeding morning, no signs of uneasiness, nor causing any 'compunctious visitings' on account of the extent of the festivities. This novel and remarkable kind of American drink must be somewhat analogous to the beverage commonly known in this country as 'Adam's Ale.'"—Punch.

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

Reply to "J. N. B"—Part 1.

"Think not that I am come to destroy the law of the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law—TILL all be fulfilled."—MATT. v. 17, 18.

"Now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter."—ROM. vii. 8.

"Shall we sin because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid!" IB. vi. 15.

"Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid! Yea, we establish the law."—IB. iii. 31.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Were I disposed to flattery, I might reciprocate compliments on the skill of my friend, and file an implied caveat with the impartial reader, not to be misled by the "lawyer-like subtlety" of his "very ingenious defense" of the Sabbath. But while fully and unaffectedly recognizing the superior ability of the advocate, confiding in the strength of my cause, I shall simply entreat the considerate to overlook this disproportion—to regard solely the evidences respectively presented—and to weigh carefully their relative cogency.

The question between J. N. B, and myself is, as he has correctly stated, strictly one of "Christian Liberty"—a question long since agitated with "much disputing"—a question obviously admitting, at the present day, but one appeal. For the Christian, all consideration of "ill effects" or of "dangerous" consequences, must be postponed to the main inquiry, "What saith the Scripture?" Disregarding, therefore, all extraneous suggestions, in favor either of a day of religious rest, or of a life of religious activity, I merely remark, that with the individual blessings, or the national prosperity, attending a "conscientious observance of the Sabbath," I have at present no concern. The point before us is its Scriptural authority. If the view I defend be unsustained by the Bible, it will doubtless be made manifest, and I shall cheerfully acknowledge a new and consequently firmer belief. If the reverse be the case, I sincerely hope, in denying that one man's liberty should be "judged of another man's conscience," that I shall not "put a stumbling block" in any believer's way, however "weak in the faith" he may be considered. Certainly, I shall neither presume to "judge" him, nor to "set him at nought."

I am reminded by J. N. B., that "the good of old were taught of God to 'call the Sabbath a delight.'" He will permit me to remind him, that the good of the new dispensation were also taught of God to call the Sabbath "a shadow"—a canceled bond—a blotted handwriting—"nailed to the cross." If it was a subject of just condemnation to them of old time who said, "When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the Sabbath, that we may set forth wheat?"—under the "better covenant" of Him who likewise "taught as one having authority," those "buried with him," and "quickened together with him," are no longer judged in respect of "the new moon or of the Sabbath days." To those adopted as "heirs," redeemed from pupilary bondage, it is rather subject for condemnation to "observe days and months"—a sign of weakness to "esteem one day above another." These striking Scriptural contrasts are pregnant with instruction. But I must hasten to the particul points presented by my friend's elaborate "reply."

1. The Day required by the Sabbath Law.

In regard to the proposition, that "there is but one Bible Sabbath, and that, the Saturday Sabbath," J. N. B. appears strangely to have misconceived my allegation. He says, "Exodus, in his defense, has ingeniously (?) dropped the last clause of this complex proposition, though it is the only one I have ever denied." Now, although it is true, that in the statement of the proposition I omitted the word "Saturday, for the sake of brevity, so far was I from dropping it "in the defense," that I distinctly asserted—and enforced by illustration—"that Saturday is 'the Sabbath enjoined in the Decalogue,' is as certain as human knowledge can be, even concerning the Bible itself."

My friend insists on a distinction between "the seventh day of the Decalogue, and the seventh day of the Jewish week." And how shall we ever ascertain which is "the seventh day of the Decalogue?" Clearly, not by itself! All legal interpretation must ultimately be based on some assumption without the statute. Now, in reference to the day required, J. N. B. admits "that for the Jews it was fixed to the last day of our week. Granted. But then it was not fixed by the Decalogue." This would be a simple impossibility. With all the ingenuity for which I give my friend credit, I challenge him to define by statute a particular day, otherwise than the fourth commandment does—namely, by adopting the universal designation of a well-recognized distinction. The term "Sunday" is not more precisive in our law, than is the term "ha-shibingi" in that of the Hebrews. It is applicable to no "seventh day" but Saturday. But it is contended that "the connexion was fixed by statute only for that people" (the Israelites.) Then, most certainly, the statute itself was "only for that people." As Whately well observes, "The difference between the Jews and the Christians is not a difference of reckoning. Our computation is the same as theirs." And the legal term is as exclusive in its application now as it was in the time of Moses. "The seventh day is the Sabbath," says the Decalogue; and Saturday is "the seventh day," says God by the manna; therefore Saturday "is the Sabbath," says the Decalogue. If the seventh day is the day "fixed" by the law, then, beyond all refuge, is Saturday the day "fixed" by it. And my friend has admitted that the day, "if once ascertained, becomes the exclusive object of the law's consideration."

Concerning the authoritative determination of the day, (by a suspension of the manna,) J. N. B. remarks, "This very mode of fixing the particular day of the week by miracle, is a circumstance applicable alike to any change of dispensation." Very true, if he means that the circumstance of a Divine revelation of what is required by a law, is as applicable to one dispensation as another; but he surely does not design to intimate that because a miracle has determined what the particular thing referred to by the law really is, a new miracle may establish a different intent in the very same law! This would be to suppose that a supernatural interpretation of a statute might be allowed to disprove the correctness of a previous supernatural interpretation! Show us, however, the miracle, (fixing another "seventh day,") and it sufficeth us.

"The whole authority of the Sabbath enjoined in the Decalogue may, for sufficient reasons, by the 'Lord of the Sabbath,' be transferred to the first day of our week." This seems to be a new phase in the alogy. Surely this first day cannot still be "the Sabbath enjoined in the Decalogue," for that is expressly limited to the seventh day of the week; and if "the whole authority" is transferred to "the first day," it must necessarily have been transferred entirely from "the seventh day," or, in other words, from the fourth commandment—since that is the only day therein specified. But even "the Lord of the Sabbath" has not power to make "the first day of the week" obligatory by a law requiring the seventh day of the week—the law remaining unchanged. Omnipotence cannot validate a contradiction.

"That a change of day would be demanded," says my friend, "seems evident from the nature of the case. The original day was originally and appropriately chosen to commemorate the work of Creation. But the work of Christ, which is our redemption, in its eternal results, must in the esteem of all Christians be of far higher and sweeter import." This consideration may be a very sufficient reason for its commemoration, but it is no reason whatever, either for superseding the former Divinely appointed memorial, or for inferring a change in the application of the original command. As well might it be contended, (if I may be allowed to illustrate great things by less,) that as the 22d of December was chosen to commemorate the landing of the Pilgrims, and as subsequently the 4th of July was distinguished by an event of broader and more interesting import, therefore "that a change of day would be demanded, seems evident from the nature of the case" And so, after strenuously contending that the original institution was "founded on reasons of perpetual force"—that the "reasons for its observance remain"—in order to sustain this memorial (that of the Pilgrim arrival,) we must carefully observe the 4th of July!—for an observance in the original way would now be wrong!" And then, to complete our humble resemblance to our orthodox prototpyes, we must zealously maintain that this observance is certainly required by the identical original institution which specifies Dec. 22d! Two suggestions might be presented in palliation of the change; first, that the institution (or hypothetical statue) does not itself "fix" the date Dec. 22d to any part of the year; and, secondly, that the whole authority of the one memorial may for sufficient reasons be transferred to the other; and we shall still have an anniversary, if it be not the anniversary.

"This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it." (Ps. cxviii. 24. On this J. N. B. remarks, "The day of Christian worship is manifestly made to correspond to and celebrate that glorious event. If so, then a Sabbath is predicted under the gospel dispensation." Admitting his postulate, this is a manifest non sequitur. If a "day of Christian worship" were necessarily a divinely-appointed Sabbath, (the only essential point,) we should certainly have many more than are set down in the calendar; but a "Sabbath" can only be established by an explicit and authoritative command, and it can only be "predicted" (predetermined) by an equally explicit designation. This text gives not a hint of any "Sabbath day." But, in the next place, I totally deny the premises. I deny that we have any warrant whatever for assuming that the passage refers to a "day of Christian worship"—to a weekly or any other periodical recurrence of time. The most that my friend can possibly make of his quotation, is that the Psalmist, or the faithful, gladdened by the anticipation of an era, ("the Messiah's exaltation,") rejoiced in "the day," not as the commencement of a week, but as the commencement of a dispensation.

"If, according to Isaiah lxv. 17, 18, the glory of the first creation is so to fade in comparison, as to cease from the commemoration of men, then here is a divine prediction of a change of the Sabbath from the seventh in the order to the first day of the week, grounded upon the very nature of things, and the consequent necessity of the case." This assumption is more gratuitous (if such be possible) than the preceding. The creation of "new heavens and a new earth," after which "the former shall not be remembered," and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard," certainly has not yet been accomplished. The parallel passage in Rev. xxi. 1, would be just as pertinent to prove "a change of the Sabbath." A respectable portion, even of the Christian church, still does remember "the seventh day" to keep it holy. But again, if the prophet's announcment possibly could be referred to an accomplished Advent, it is much stronger to prove my side of the question, than that of J. N. B. If the Creator's seventh day rest is not to be remembered longer, then is the institution commemorating it, ipso facto, annulled. And so far from having any corresponding memorial to replace it, we are to "be glad and rejoice for ever." "And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord." Isai. lxvi. 23.

To establish a new Sabbath law, however—or, what is the same thing, "a change of the Sabbath"—we require more decisive authority than the supposed intimations of an uncertain prophecy, or presumptions derived "from the nature of the case." I have demanded direct proof that such a change has been commanded; I have asked for "the chapter and verse" from the New Covenant recording such command. My friend thus answers the appeal: "That such a change was made in fact—in other words, that the day appropriated to Christian worship, and the commemoration of the work of Redemption, (especially in the Eucharist, or "breaking of bread,") was the first day of the week; that this was sanctioned by Christ himself, after his resurrection, as the "Lord of the Sabbath;" that it has the example of the inspired apostles in its favor; that it was familiarly known and acknowledged among all Christians as "the Lord's day," i. e., the day by His authority consecrated to Him—are four distinct facts, for which we can cite both chapter and verse. See John xx. 16; Matt. xxviii. 9—11; Luke xxiv. 30—40; John xx. 19, 20, 26—29; Acts ii. 1—4; xx. 6, 7; xxi. 4, 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2; Rev. i. 10."

Overlooking the immethodical junction of "four distinct" propositions, (suggestive that their union is their safety,) I remark, that the full admission of all of them would prove just nothing concerning "a change of the Sabbath." This vital word, unfortunately for my friend's side of the question, had to be omitted from all his decisive "facts" built on "chapter and verse!" 1st. The texts from the evangelists may be summarily disposed of. Not one of them proves—or tends to prove—any thing to the point. A person uninformed of their required use, would be sadly puzzled to surmise what precept they most approved. It is inferred, that because Jesus appeared to his disciples on Sunday, this must be a divinely appointed Sabbath! A most singular method of superseding a positive commandment, one would think! And since several "appearances" are recorded, occurring on different days, I suppose we are to have several Sabbath days in the week, exclusive of that of the Decalogue. It is observable, that all the appearances above quoted took place (with a single exception) on one and the same day—that of the resurrection; and this one exception (John xx 26) most probably took place on Monday or Tuesday—eight days afterwerd. The "third" appearance, my friend himself will hardly admit to have been on Sunday! (John xxi.) 2d. The only "fact" discoverable from the Acts, is that the disciples met together on Sunday;* and if this establishes a Sabbath, then have we superabundant evidence that Saturday is the true Sabbath after all! (See Acts xvii. 2; xviii. 4; ix. 2; xiii. 5, 14, 42, 44; xvi. 13; &c., &c.) The truth is, the primitive Christians met on all days for social worship and for "breaking bread." (Acts i. 14; ii. 42; 46, 47.) 2d. The utmost we can glean from the Epistle to the Corinthians, is that in the middle of the first century, Sunday assemblies† were probably more common—at least in Galatia and Corinth, though at Jerusalem such was not the case, (Acts xxi. 17—21,) than those of other days. But the text rather *dis*proves a "Sabbath" than otherwise. 4th. The quotation from Rev. i. teaches—nothing!

Such, then, is the sum of my friend's Scripture testimony for a new Sabbath day. We ask for a single explicit command establishing a Christian Sabbath, and we are pointed to a few unconnected historical (!) passages, not one of which is pretended to contain any command, and which go to indicate a divine precept about as much as they do a Sabbath—a "Sabbath" as much as they do—a "new moon!" Well may we say with Paley, "The opinion that Christ and his Apostles meant to retain the duties of the Jewish Sabbath, shifting only the day from the seventh to the first, seems to prevail without sufficient proof!"

Not only have we no shadow of evidence that Jesus or his apostles changed the Sabbath day, but, in the language of Archbishop Whately, "it is even abundantly plain that they made no such change. There are indeed sufficiently plain marks of the early Christians having observed the Lord's day as a religious festival; but so far were they from substituting this for the Jewish Sabbath, that all of them who were Jews actually continued themselves to observe the Mosaic Sabbath." J. N. B. himself admits, that "indeed it is evident that for many years the Apostles observed both, though for different reasons, and only among the Jews;" admitting thereby, that Sunday did not suporsede the "Sabbath." The Apostle James, (called "the Lord's brother," and first bishop of the mother church at Jerusalem,) in advocating the Gentile exemption from the Mosaic law, reminds the believing Jews, that they could still, as of old time, have their law preached "every Sabbath day," (Acts xv. 21;) and in his general Epistle to them, written several years afterward, he makes evident allusion to their Sabbath assemblies—literally, "synagogues." (James ii. 2.) His own church, as we learn from the early writers, retained the observance of the Sabbath through the long and uninterrupted succession of fifteen Jewish bishops. (Eusibeus,—Hist. Eccl., lib. iv., cap. 5. Compare also Acts xxi. 17—21 with Matt. xxiv. 20.)

J. N. B. appeals to "Ecclesiastical History," to "confirm" what he utterly fails to establish by the authority of the Scriptures—a change of the Sabbath. Though my own position in the controversy does not require it, I am perfectly willing to follow my friend, (if space be permitted,) into this extensive and interesting field of biblical illustration; but here, as before, we must have "chapter and verse;" we must have careful translations, and not paraphrases. I am prepared thus to show, by citations, that a chain of "Fathers," from the Apostolic age to the fifth century—that Ignatius of Antioch, Justin Martyr, Irenæus of Lyons, Tertullian of Carthage, Theophilus of Antioch, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Cyprian, Athanasius, Eusebius, Jerome, Chrysostom, Augustine, and various other early writers—all "agree in their views of the Lord's day, or the day of Christ's resurrection," as an institution altogether independent of the Decalogue, and entirely different from the "Sabbath!"

Says Ignatius, "If we still continue to live according to the Jewish law, we acknowledge that we have not received grace;" and he boasts of those "arrived at the newness of hope, no longer observing the Sabbath, but living according to the Lord's life, ('kata kuriaken-zoen,')* in which our life is sprung up by him." (Epist. Magnes. sec. 8, 9.) And yet my friend claims his authority that Sunday is the Sabbath!

Justin, when reproached by the Jew Trypho for "observing no Sabbath," so far from repelling the charge by alledging a change of the day, distinctly admits its truth. "Do you not see," says he, "that the elements are never idle, and keep no Sabbath? Continue as created; for if there was no need of circumcision before Abraham, nor of the observance of the Sabbath before Moses, neither now is there need of them after Jesus Christ, the Son of God." (Dialog. cum Tryphone.) And yet my friend claims his authority!

Irenæus holds that the Sabbath—like circumcision—was a symbolical institution; that it was given to the Jews as a peculiar sign of God's providence, and not to their fathers; and that it was representative of the Christian's entire devotion to God—of his abstinence from avaricious cares, or the pursuit of earthly treasures. "And since these ceremonies were not for man's justification, but were given to the people as a 'sign,' it shows that Abraham himself, without circumcision, and without an observance of the Sabbath, believed in God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness." (Contra Hæres. lib. iv. cap. 30.) And yet my friend claims his authority! †

Tertullian strongly contends with the Jews, that Christians observe circumcision and the Sabbath spiritually, as foreshadowed by their prophets; and he argues that since God gave neither circumcision nor the Sabbath to Adam—or to Abel—or to Enoch—or to Noah, &c., and yet "praised" them, so "we also, without the law of Moses, can please God." (Opera: cap. Advers. Jud. 207—210.) And yet my friend claims his authority!

Indeed, it is an indisputable fact, that the early Fathers—almost without exception—contrast the "Lord's day" with the Sabbath; that they put them on entirely different grounds; and that they restrict the term "Sabbath" (as the Bible always does) to "the seventh day" of the week. Very rarely—if ever—is Sunday observance derived from the obligation of the fourth commandment. "The ancient churches called it constantly by the name 'Lord's day,' and never called it the Sabbath, but when they spoke analogically by allusion to the Jewish Sabbath, even as they called the holy table the altar," &c. (Baxter's Works, vol. iii., "On the Lord's Day," chap. 7.) The true "scriptural view is confirmed in the clearest manner by Ecclesiastical History."

Cave remarks concerning Saturday, "The word 'sabbatum' is constantly used in the writings of the Fathers, when speaking of it as relates to Christians." (Prim. Chris. 1, chap. vii.) It was not till erroneous views of the day of Christian worship began to be entertained, that it was ever supposed to "absorb into itself the authority of the original law"—the fourth commandment.

"As regards the Sabbath or Sunday," says Luther, (Michelet's Life, book iv., chap. 2,) "there is no necessity for keeping it; but if we do, it ought to be not on account of Moses' commandment, but because nature teaches us from time to time to take a day of rest."

"There exist monstrous disputations," says Melancthon, (Augsburg Confession of Faith, 1530,) "touching the change of the Sabbath, which have sprung up from the false persuasion that a worship like the Levitical was needful in the church. . . . They who think that by the authority of the church the observation of the Lord's day was appointed instead of the Sabbath, as if necessary, are greatly deceived."

Says Cranmer, (Catechism, 1548,) "We now keep no more the Sabbath, or Saturday, as the Jews did; but we observe the Sunday, and some other days, as the magistrates do judge convenient."

Calvin, after his able exposition of the true import of the Sabbath law, adds, "Thus vanish all the dreams of false prophets, who in past ages have infested the people with a Jewish notion, affirming that nothing but the ceremonial part of this commandment (which according to them is the appointment of 'the seventh day') has been abrogated, but that the moral part of it—that is the observance of one day in seven—still remains!" (Instit. lib, ii. cap. viii.)

Whately justly contends, that "if the precepts relative to the ancient Sabbath are acknowledged to remain in force, then the observance of the first day of the week instead of 'the seventh' becomes an unwarrantable presumption." (Essay on the Sabbath.)

Neander remarks: "The festival of Sunday was always only a human ordinance, and it was far from the intention of the Apostles to establish a divine command in this respect—far from them, and from the early apostolic church, to transfer the law of the Sabbath to Sunday." (History of Christian Church, sec. iii.)

But I have already considerably exceeded my appointed limits; and am compelled to pause. In justice to myself, I must notice an intimation of J. N. B., that I may have made a use "of the unguarded language of others they never designed." Painful as such a conviction would be, I should certainly be thankful to my friend for its frank indication. If, through prejudice or inadvertence, I have given an unfair coloring to authorities, I would much rather be corrected and retract a mistaken application, than continue in error, or labor under an intangible imputation.

EXODUS.

* Paul necessarily traveled on Sunday, either to reach or to leave Troas. [Acts xx. 6. 7.] It is almost certain, as "the first day of the week" commenced at sunset on Saturday evening, that Paul's midnight sermon was on Saturday night, preparatory to his departure on Sunday morning. [See verse 11.] The time of holding religious assemblies among the primitive Christians—as Mosheim informs us—"was generally in the evening after sunset, or in the morning before dawn." [Eccles. Hist. Book I. Cent. II. Part II. ch. iv. sec. 8.] It is scarcely possible that the Apostle's discourse could have extended six or eight hours into the second day.

† I am willing to give my friend the benefit of the most liberal concession he can claim. But it is at least debatable whether the expression "lay by him" ["par' eauto"] does not simply import a private reservation on Saturday evening, [the first of the week,] of a portion of the past week's earnings. 1 Cor. xvi. 2. The language is striking—"ekastos thesaurizon"—"each one treasuring up!" Not a word is said about the collection being "upon the first day of the week."

* Even Archbishop Wake's false translation of this passage ("Lord's day") will not help my friend.

† It is peculiarly unfortunate that the only actual quotation from the "Fathers" attempted by my friend should be an erroneous one. He quotes Irenæus as saying, "'On the Lord's day we Christians keep the Sabbath.' Were the first Christians Anti-Sabbatarians? So far from it, a man who refused to keep Sabbath on the Lord's day would not have been easily recognized by Irenæus as a Christian. Let Exodus think of this." My friend has quoted at second-hand; he will excuse me for saying that no such passage can be found in Irenæus! The first Christians most decidedly were Anti-Sabbatarians; as proved by the New Testament, and all the Apostolic Fathers. I doubt whether a single writer, in the first two centuries of the Christian era, ever calls Sunday the "Sabbath," or ever claims either the fourth commandment, or any apostolic injunction, as authorizing Sunday observance.

WORDS FITLY SPOKEN.

The Congregational Journal, in a notice of the late Ephraim P. Bradford, of Francestown, relates the following anecdote. It shows how deep an impression may sometimes unintentionally be made, and how precious are opportunities of intercourse with the young, in such circumstances as to secure their earnest and favorable attention. How little conscious was Mr. Bradford of his power over that lad's heart and mind, and whole life!

"When he [Mr. Bradford] was a member of college, upon returning to his studies after teaching a school through the winter, he stopped at a town in Massachusetts to spend the night with a classmate. It so chanced that his brother schoolmaster shared his bed with a lad, the son of the respectable and substantial farmer with whom he boarded, and the traveler must accommodate himself with whatever of the bed had not been secured by the right of pre-occupancy. Supposing the lad had fallen asleep, the two friends fell into free conversation, in which Mr. Bradford gave his advice and counsel to his classmate as to his studies, habits, and conduct. Long years had passed away, life itself was coming to a close, and Mr. Bradford and the lad had not met again.

"The lad had become a Boston merchant, a Boston millionaire; and remembering Mr. Bradford, wrote him a kind and respectful letter, stating that he had never forgotten the night when he lodged with him, and overheard the wise counsels he gave to his classmate, and the influence of which he had felt through life, whatever his classmate might have done; and hearing he was not better provided for than he should be, begged him to accept the accompanying expression of his gratitude and affectionate regards—an expression worthy of a merchant prince. Both reached his house; but a few days before, the designed recipient, attacked suddenly, fatally, after an hour's struggle, had passed above, not beyond, as we trust, earthly friendships, but beyond the reach of earthly regrets, and the need of earthly benefactions."

THE FIRST PRINTED BOOK.

It is a remarkable and most interesting fact, that the very first use to which the discovery of printing was applied, was the production of the Holy Bible. This was accomplished at Mentz between the years 1450 and 1455. Guttenburg, was the inventor of the art, and Faust, a goldsmith, furnished the necessary funds. Had it been a single page, or even an entire sheet, which was then produced, there might have been less occasion to notice it; but there was something in the whole character of the affair, which, if not unprecedented, rendered it singular in the usual current of human events. This Bible was in two folio volumes, which have been justly praised for the strength and beauty of the paper, the exactness of the register, and the lustre of the ink. The work contained twelve hundred and eighty-two pages, and being the first ever printed, of course involved a long period of time, and an immense amount of mental, manual, and mechanical labor; and yet, for a long time after it had been finished, and offered for sale, not a single human being, save the artists themselves, knew how it had been accomplished.

Of the first printed Bible, eighteen copies are now known to be in existence, four of which are printed on vellum. Two of these are in England, one being in the Grenville collection. One is in the Royal Library of Berlin, and one in the Royal Library of Paris. Of the fourteen remaining copies, ten are in England—there being a copy in the libraries of Oxford, Edinburgh, and London, and seven in the collections of different noblemen. The vellum copy has been sold as high as $1,300.

THE GREATEST BLESSING.—I envy no quality of the mind or of the intellect in others, be it genius, power, wit, or fancy; but if I could choose what would be most delightful, and I believe most useful, I would prefer religion to every other blessing, for it makes life a discipline of of goodness, creates new hopes, throws over the destruction of existence the most gorgeous of all lights, awakens life even in death, and from corruption and decay calls up beauty and divinity. IMPORTACE OF LITTLE THINGS.

BY MRS. HANNAH MORE.

"Since trifles make the sun of human things,
And half our misery from our foibles springs—
Since life's best joys consist in peace and ease,
And though but few can serve, yet all may please,
Oh let the ungentle spirit learn from thence,
'A small unkindness is a great offense;'
The mild forbearance of a brother's fault,
The angry word suppressed, the taunting thought,
Subduing and subdued, the petty strife
Which clouds the color of domestic life,
The sober comfort, all the peace which springs
From the large aggregate of little things—
On these small cares of daughter, wife, or friend,
The almost sacred joys of HOME depend.
There, Sensibility, thou mayest reign;
Home is thy true, legitimate domain."

ANECDOTE OF LATIMER.

The following anecdote was related by the Rev. H. Stowell, in an address before the Irish Society of London at its late anniversary:—

It was related of Latimer, that when he once preached before that tyrant, Henry the VIII., he took a plain straightforward text, and in his sermon assailed those very sins for which the monarch was notorious; and he was stung to the quick, for the truth always finds a response in the worst man's conscience. He would not bend beneath the authority of his God, and he therefore sent for Latimer, and said, "Your life is in jeopardy if you do not recant all you said to-day when you preach next Sunday." The trimming courtiers were all anxious to know the consequences of this, and the chapel was crowded. The venerable man took his text, and, after a pause, begun with a soliloquy, thus: "Now, Hugh Latimer, bethink thee, thou art in the presence of thy earthly monarch; thy life is in his hands, and if thou dost not suit thyself to his fancies, he will bring down thy gray hairs with blood to the grave; but, Hugh Latimer, bethink thee, thou art in the presence of the King of kings and Lord of lords, who hath told thee, 'Fear not them that kill the body, and then can do no more; but rather fear Him who can kill both body and soul, and cast thee into hell for ever!' Yea, I say, Hugh Latimer, fear him." He then went on, and not only repeated what he had before advanced, but, if possible, enforced it with greater emphasis. What was the consequence? Henry sent for him, and said, "How durst thou insult thy monarch so?" Latimer replied, "I thought if I were unfaithful to my God, it would impossible to be loyal to my king." The king embraced the good bishop, exclaiming, "And is there yet one man left who is bold and honest enough to tell me the truth?"

MILTON ON BUNHILL FIELDS.

Almost adjoining Finsbury square is the New Artillery Ground, of which mention has already been made as the spot where the artillery was proved, and where the train bands of the city were exercised. Close by was an interesting spot, Artillery walk, Bunhill Fields, containing the house in which Milton completed his "Paradise Lost," and in which he breathed his last, in November, 1674. The site is pointed out by the present Artillery place, Bunhill row. Milton's nephew and biographer, Philips, informs us, that during the time the great poet lived in Artillery walk, he used, in fine summer weather, to sit at the door of his house, in a coarse gray cloth cloak, to enjoy the fresh air, and that in this manner he received the visits of persons of rank and genius, who came, either to pay homage to him, or to enjoy his conversation. A Dr. Wright, a clergyman of Dorsetshire, informed Philips that he once paid a visit to the blind poet in Artillery walk. He found him in a small apartment, on the first floor, hung with rusty green, where he was seated in an elbow-chair, neatly dressed in a black suit. His face was pale, but not cadaverous. He was suffering much from gout, and especially from chalk-stones; and he told Dr. Wright that were it not for the pain he endured, his blindness would be tolerable. It was in this house that he was visited by Dryden. Aubrey tells us:—"John Dryden, Esq., Poet Laureat, who very much admired him, went to him to have leave to put his 'Paradise Lost' into a drama in rhyme. Mr. Milton received him civilly, and told him he would give him leave to tagge his verses."

DYING TO SELF.

The pious Mr. Berridge says, in a letter to Mrs. Wilberforce, when she was in trying circumstances—"Live as near to Jesus as you possibly can, but die, die to self. It is a daily work—it is a hard work. I find myself to be like an insurmountable mountain, or a perpendicular rock, that must be overcome! I have not got over it, nor half way over! This, this is my greatest trial! Self is like a mountain; Jesus is a sun that shines on the other side of the mountain; and now and then a sunbeam shines over the top; we get a glimpse, a sort of twilight apprehension of the brightness of the sun; but self must be much more subdued in me before I can bask in the sunbeams of the ever blessed Jesus, or say in every thing, 'Thy will be done!'"

SAD EXPERIENCES.—Mr. Potter, of Yale College, in a temperance address, lately, at New Haven, said:—

"My heart bleeds as I remember the fate of three of my early companions, who started in life with myself. One of them possessed one of the finest mathematical minds I ever knew. He would take the ledger, and go up with three columns at a time with perfect ease. He was the first man in America who beat the automaton chess player, and he told me that he had every move in his head before he entered the room. That man fills a drunkard's grave. Another, who was an excellent accountant, and could command almost any salary, met the same melancholy fate. Another, possessing the same brilliant capacities, has gone down—not to the grave, perhaps, but he has sunk out of sight amid the mire and filth of intemperance."

The Sabbath Recorder.

"AMERICAN AND FOREIGN SABBATH UNION."

On the 11th inst. was held, in the Mercer-street Presbyterian Church, in this city, the Anniversary of the "American and Foreign Sabbath Union." The customary sermon was delivered by the Rev. Edward Beecher, D. D., and was, like the sermons generally delivered before that body, a very able production. By this we do not mean, that it was all according to God's truth. We mean, simply, that it was an exhibition of mental power worthy of a better cause. But as this may sound rather profane to some ears, we would add, that no cause could be better, provided it were the Sabbath in reality which he and his coadjutors were endeavoring to advance. But when we consider, that it is nothing but a humanly devised festival whose observance they undertake to promote, and that for the sake of doing so they baptize it with a name to which it has no just or scriptural title, thereby making void the very commandment which they profess to honor; and that the men who do this are men whose opportunities for knowing better have been ample; we confess, that we find it difficult to give them as much credit for sincerity as the charity which 'thinketh no evil' seems to require.

Very conclusively, and much to our satisfaction, did the reverend gentleman reason upon the nature of organic or social sins, showing that, so far from losing their character as sins because committed by the State, they were, on that very account, the giant sins of the land. He admitted that a nation or State, as such, could not sin. If a wicked law was enacted, it was not the State, as such, that was guilty before God, but the individual legislators, who, by combining their influence, and giving expression to it in the form of a statute, thereby gave permanence and power to their wickedness beyond what it could have had under any other circumstances. The government was but the machinery, through which individual legislators carried into execution their wicked plans—the mighty engine, by which they operated for evil upon immense numbers not otherwise to be reached. Hence he argued, that the sins of nations, or corporate bodies, were the most enormous and tremendously destructive sins that could be committed. This, in our opinion, is sound doctrine. It is in accordance with the teachings of Scripture, and with the holy feelings of the Christian, which instinctively prompt him to abhor "the throne of iniquity, which frameth mis-

Agreeing, as we did, with the speaker, we could not help thinking how great was the guilt of our nation in lending its coöperation to the States to crush three millions of human beings in bondage, hunting the panting fugitive, and thrusting him back into a state of degradation which has no parallel this side of hell. We thought too of the mighty mass of guilt accumulated in its perfidious treatment of Indian tribes. The wrongs inflicted upon Mexico also came flitting across our mind. And as we ruminated upon one thing and another, which went to stamp our nation with iniquity, we could not help thinking of the relation in which it stood to the Sabbath day. It requires its business, in all its various departments, to be carried on every Sabbath day. Congress holds its sessions on the Sabbath day. The mail is transported, and the post-offices are opened, on the Sabbath. The great public departments at Washington are always open, and business is transacted in them, as regularly as the Sabbath comes round. The Custom Houses are open, the United States Courts are in session, and the officers of government, throughout the length and breadth of the land, are all in active service on the Sabbath. In short, the whole nation seems wrapt in profound ignorance that there is any such God-given institution.

But do not be mistaken, reader. By the Sabbath day we mean just what God means, not what the "American and Foreign Sabbath Union" means. And if guilt attaches to the nation for not recognizing it, how much more guilty is the Christian Church, that lends its combined influence to countenance its profanation! How guilty the ministers of the Church, themselves breaking the Fourth Commandment, and "teaching men so!" Truly, it is awful to think of; and never did the great wickedness of the churches, and of their religious guides, so solemnly impress us, as when listening to the Rev. Doctor's discourse. "Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?" The sin of blotting out the Sabbath of God is chargeable, not to the nation, but to the churches of the land. The theology of the Church has frittered away the nation's conscience, and the denunciations of Heaven against a Sabbath-breaking people do therefore fall like feathers upon a coat of mail.

The failure, hitherto, of all efforts to induce Congress to put a stop to the transportation of the mail on the first day of the week, and to repeal the law of 1810 requiring postmasters to attend at their offices for the reception and delivery of letters on that day as well as on other days of the week, called forth the preacher's lamentations, as was to be expected. As a matter of course, Col. Johnson's celebrated Sunday Mail Report came in for a share of his denunciation. It was spoken of as a wretched piece of sophistry, and the action of Congress in adopting it, as an impious affront to the Lord of Heaven. As we have not the Sunday Mail Report now before us, and as our memory is too treacherous to be relied upon, we shall not undertake to vindicate the logic, or the theology, of that document. Upon the matter in general we have only to remark, that if any of the members of that memorable Congress did really think that Sunday was the divinely-appointed Sabbath day, they did nothing more, in voting for the cessation of mail transportation and the closing of post-offices on that day, than we should have done under like circumstances. Were we honored with a seat in our National Legislature, and a proposition were made to suspend all the business of government on the seventh day of the week, we are very certain that we should vote for it. We would never, by vote, or by voice, or by any other connivance, employ the machinery of government to spread Sabbath profanation through the land. But, on the other hand, we protest against the empty outcry, that government "compels" its officials to profane the day of rest. Those whom government employs to do its business, are not its slaves. The compact between them is altogether voluntary. A man enters into the service of government from choice; he continues in it from choice. If the service interferes with any religious duty, he is not obliged to continue in it. The remedy is obvious and simple. He can resign. The immense patronage wielded by government may constitute a mighty temptation to those who enjoy it to barter away their conscience—to make sale of it for so many dollars and cents; and in this, if any thing, consists the sin. But as to any compulsion to serve, the idea is simply ridiculous. In the name of reason, why is not some outcry raised about the sin of accepting an office from government, which requires a person to violate his conscience? Why are not the thousand and one postmasters, who are required to attend to their offices on the first day of the week, charged with guilt in having voluntarily placed themselves in such a situation? Why are not the numerous mail contractors, and the drivers of their coaches, held up to reproof for engaging in business which leads them to trample upon what is supposed to be holy time? Some of them are members of Christian churches, in good standing. Why are they not put under discipline? If the government sins so heinously, why do these men manifest such a willingness to partake of the sin?

We, of course, do not believe that government sins in occasionally holding a session of Congress on Sunday, and causing the mails to be transported, and the post-offices to be opened on that day. God has given no commandment to keep the Sunday holy; and "where no law is, there is no transgression." The right or wrong of an act itself is to be judged of by its conformity, or want of conformity, to the law of God. On this principle, if we should write to the end of time, we could never admit that sin was committed by government in appropriating the first day of the week to the transaction of its business. The amount of guilt incurred by the perpetrators of the act is another question. Guilt resides in the intention; so that if one intends to violate the law of God, he is guilty, whether he accomplishes his intention or not. Peradventure the managers of our government are guilty in requiring business to be attended to on Sunday. But this depends upon a question, the affirmative of which is quite too readily taken for granted. Do the managers of the government really believe the Sunday to be the divinely-appointed Sabbath day? And do they, in causing it to be profaned, as clearly exhibit their intention to trample upon the divine law, as if it were in reality the day required by the Fourth Commandment? The friends of the "American and Foreign Sabbath Union" would like to have everybody think so, but we beg leave to express our doubts.

In expressing our doubts, however, we do not mean to deny absolutely that the conductors of our government believe Sunday to be a holy day. We have no doubt that some of them do suppose it to be the divinely-appointed day. We can easily admit this with regard to those who have sprung from Puritan ancestors, and have been schooled in the peculiarities of their theology. Some of our Congressmen are, doubtless, in this situation—some of our post-masters—some of our mail-carriers. If these can be identified we have no objection to their being held up as guilty. But that it is true of all, that they have conscience of the Sunday, we do not believe. We know that it is not true of the community in general; and we see no reason for thinking that it is true of the House of Congress in particular. At all events, we want better proof of it than the hasty asseverations of those who have a zeal not according to knowledge. Very many have imbibed their religious notions at the fountain of Quakerism, which, as every one knows, teaches that there is no Sabbath under the gospel. From their infancy they have been trained to consider all days alike; and they do no violence to their consciences when they work on the first day of the week—none whatever. Quakerism has done more to mould the religious opinions of community, then those of Puritan predilections are willing to allow. For though its avowed disciples do not compare, in point of numbers, with the other sects, its principles have pervaded society very extensively. But not only those who have been trained in the school of Quakerism, but also a very large number of those who have been trained under Baptist influence, and a large number of those who have been trained under Episcopalian influence, and a large number of those who have been trained under Lutheran influence, as well as a great many others, have ever been taught that the Gospel has abrogated the law of the Sabbath. They look upon the Sunday as nothing more than a religious festival, which was originally instituted by the Church, and has been rendered venerable by time. They may have some sort of conscience about keeping it, but not that sort which is founded in a conviction of its sabbatic character. Hence, under all circumstances which appear to them to constitute an emergency, they are ready to relax their usual austerity, and to perform worldly business; and for so doing their conscience never reproaches them. Moreover, the number is by no means small of those who feel such a conviction that the only Sabbath enjoined in the Bible is the seventh day of the week, that they can never feel any compunctious of guilt for having violated the first. They cannot feel that they invade the sanctity of the institution, unless they profane the very day which the law of the institution enjoins. They know of no other mode of invading it.

These various influences have been operating to direct the religious opinions of the people, from the earliest settlement of our country. That man is, to say the least, wild, who asserts that they have all sunk into insignificance, or been neutralized by the influence of Puritanism. The Puritan sentiment has had its influence, it is true, and in some localities, an all-engrossing influence. But if we take the entire community, we shall find every variety and shade of opinion, from a vague supposition that the first day of the week is the divinely-appointed Sabbath, down to a settled conviction that all days are alike. Who can say that all this variety of opinion did not obtain in the Congress which refused to put a stop to Sunday mails? If it did, what kind of charity is it which denounces the members of that body as having intended to trample upon the Divine Law? We shall not believe that they intended any such thing, till we have better proof of it than we have yet had. Heaven knows that our nation is guilty enough, without lying under a charge of that of which it is innocent.

Notwithstanding the memorials to Congress for the discontinuance of the Sunday mail have been based upon the assumption that postmasters, and others, were compelled to violate their consciences by the law of 1810, we wonder whether the noisy bruiters of this absurdity ever feel any sympathy for poor Seventh-day Baptists, who by law are absolutely compelled, in many of the States, to refrain from all worldly business on the first day of the week? Even in those States where there are special statutes in their favor, they are prohibited from carrying their labors beyond their own immediate premises. When we circulate petitions to have such unequal laws blotted from the statute book, will the friends of the "American and Foreign Sabbath Union" lend us their influence? Will they go up to the Legislatures and plead our cause? No, verily. There is not one of them who would give us the least countenance. And Doctor Edwards, the great master spirit of the "Sabbath Union," exults that we are under bonds to keep the peace. When your bull gores my ox, how wonderfully it alters the case!

But we must bring these remarks to a close. We had almost forgotten to tell our readers where the Doctor took his text. It was in Job 34 : 29—"When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only." The object of the discourse was to show the bearing of the Sabbath upon national prosperity.

Opening of the Exhibition—The Jewish Disabilities Bill—The Sunday Trading Bill—Population of Glasgow—Miss Talbot.

GLASGOW, May 2d, 1851.

The Commissioners having charge of the arrangements for the Exhibition at the Crystal Palace, lately issued an intimation implying that the Queen's visit at the opening would be private. Great dissatisfaction at this proposal was expressed; and, in consequence, the intention of Her Majesty to appear publicly on the occasion, was formally and officially announced. It is now alledged, that the first intention arose from a previous accidental discovery, during the process of unpacking one of the groups of statuary from Italy, that the whole hollow interior of this statuary was charged with gunpowder. But whatever truth there may be in this report, the opening has been made without casualty. Yesterday morning, at 9 o'clock, the numerous doors were thrown open to those possessed of season tickets; and, by half past 11 o'clock, 30,000 persons had entered within the building without confusion. Indeed, it seemed as if it could have contained five times the number. Among the earliest of the visitors, was the punctual, aged veteran, the Duke of Wellington. At 12 o'clock, the Queen, Prince Albert, and the two eldest of the Royal Children, and the distinguished foreigners, arrived. After prayer by the Archbishop of Canterbury, there followed a royal procession around the building, when the opening was announced amid a flourish of trumpets and firing of cannon. The organs playing at the east and west ends were inaudible at the transept in the center. The mass of people in the streets was enormous; yet no accident there is mentioned; but a melancholy railway collision near Warrington proved fatal to five persons, when a considerable number were also severely injured. About 50,000 arrived in London, the previous day, by the different railway trains. Parliament did not meet last night till 6 o'clock; but Col. Sibthrop stated in the House of Commons, in the course of severe animadversions, that he had been prevented by religious scruples from being present at the opening of the Crystal Palace.

On the motion, last night, for the second reading of Lord John Russell's Removal of Jewish Disabilities Bill, a number of the members expressed their displeasure at the Premier's proposal in very strong terms; but the motion was carried by a majority of 202 against 177. Its passing the House of Commons may therefore be looked upon as almost certain; but it is still very questionable whether it will not be rejected by the Lords. It is not probable that many Jews can at any time be returned as Members of Parliament; and the principal objection against the Bill seems to arise from apprehensions, probably well-founded, that there will be an extension of the principle which modifies the clause of the oath, so as to admit the avowed infidel and most determined enemy to Christianity. Such are excluded at present, where there is any regard to consistency, as the absurdity and falsehood would be very palpable, if they were to swear any thing "on the true faith of a Christian."

The Metropolitan Sunday Trading Bill, as amended by the Select Committee of the House of Commons, has been printed, and from the multitudinous exceptions to its operation, it perhaps matters little whether it pass now or not. It does not extend its preventive provisions to apothecaries, chemists, or druggists, selling any articles for medicinal purposes—nor to persons selling milk or cream between the hours of ten and one o'clock—nor to persons, during the same hours, selling fruit, pastry, cooked victuals, writing materials, or any beverage not being wine, spirits, beer, or other fermented or distilled liquors other than beer at or under a penny half-penny per quart, or ginger beer—nor to persons, during the same hours, selling any newspaper or other periodical—nor to persons selling, even after one o'clock in the afternoon—nor to persons selling fuel, fodder, or food, before ten o'clock in the morning—nor to any one in his dwelling-place selling to any lodger—nor to the selling of provisions, liquors, or refreshments, on board steam or other vessels—nor does it prevent dealers in meat, fish, poultry, game, or wild-fowl, sending articles, before nine o'clock Sunday morning, to the residences of purchasers—although these liberties are not to extend to publicans and licensed victualers. And it is not unlikely that the Bill may be yet farther modified ere it pass into a law.

In Glasgow, during the last few months, a number of petty dealers in several of the articles proposed to be exempted in the metropolis, have been fined for their Sunday sale. And while the steamers ply freely on the Thames on Sunday, none leave this city on the Clyde, although the English and Irish steamers usually arrive here on that day. Several of our Scottish railways, however, run Sunday trains; and we have long ago expressed the conviction, that this was destined to destroy Sunday sanctity. An illustration of the correctness of this opinion occurred last month. Mr. Cowan, M. P. for Edinburgh, an elder, I think, of the Free Church, has repeatedly taken a decided part against the running of Sunday trains, yet a correspondent of the Scotsman intimates that on Sunday, April 13th, he was fellow-traveler on the Caledonian railway with Mr. Cowan, from London to Bealtock, a station within 67 miles of Edinburg.

The rapid increase of the population of New York will cause the growth of British cities to seem quite insignificant; yet to some of the readers of the Sabbath Recorder it may be interesting to know, that according to the returns for the Government Census, the population of Glasgow, within what is known as the Parliamentary bounds, is 329,096, which in 1841 was 267,463, being an increase during these ten years of 61,633. Including the suburbs which lie beyond these bounds, the present returns give a population of 358,926, the increase on this extended district during the same ten years being a population of 66,302. The average house accommodation is 52 to each dwelling. We may add in this connection, that the Glasgow Petition to Parliament against the Papal Aggression, which is restricted to males above 14 years of age, has now appended to it 56,590 signatures.

Having formerly referred to Miss Talbot, the Chancery ward, but doomed, by those in whose hands she was, to be confined for life in Taunton Convent, and enrich the Romish Church with her fortune of £80,000, I may note that she seems to have fairly escaped from the meshes of the net which was prepared for her feet. Lord Howard, M. P., has, by his agent, applied to the Court of Chancery for approbation to his proposal to marry the young lady, she herself having given her consent. His lordship is in his 34th year, and is a son of the Duke of Norfolk, (the premier Roman Catholic Peer,) and holds the office of Vice Chamberlain to the Queen. The marriage, although to a Papist, will prove a sad loss to the Romish Church; for not only will the fortune be lost to the Taunton Convent, but it passes into the hands of one noted as not being a strict Romanist. And it is stated that Dr. Hendren, the Romish Bishop of Clifton, calculat- with so much confidence that he would have the disposal of the £80,000, that he has purchased three acres of ground, at £500 an acre, on which he meant to erect a magnificent cathedral within his diocese. Other two convent cases were before the public, to the scandal of religion, one in England and the other in the West of Ireland. In both cases, parents complained of their children having been taken or entrapped into these prisons, and of access being denied to them. In the Irish case, the priests have yielded and sent home the daughter to her father, to prevent farther exposure.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 11.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

Old Providence—The Residence of Mr. Taylor—Fisheries—Productions—Population—Pirate's Fort—Rescue of the remaining Passengers from the Wreck—Poisoned by the Manchineel—Leave the Island—Arrive at Key West—Conclusion.

Old Providence Island is in latitude 13° 23′, longitude 81° 20′. It is about twelve miles in circuit, is very mountainous, and may be seen in ordinary weather sixty miles at sea. It is surrounded on all sides by a reef, about a mile distant on the south and west, but on the north-east it extends four or five, having but one entrance, narrow, and difficult to find without a pilot. This is close under a bluff known as Morgan's Head, so named from the celebrated Buccaneer Chief of that name, whose fierce and brutal exploits made him for a long time the terror of the Spanish Main. This island was selected by him as the center of his piratical empire, and was twice captured by him, fortified, and abandoned. It is well calculated for defense, as vessels of large draft cannot enter the harbor, and a small force within could repulse any number of small vessels. A rock situated here at the water's edge, about one hundred feet high, was fortified by the pirates, and afterwards held by the patriots in the revolutionary struggle of the Spanish colonies. Here they fitted out privateers to prey upon the Spanish commerce. It is the only fortress that I ever saw held by Spaniards, where there was not an avenue for safe retreat, this rock being almost perpendicular on every side, and such as desperate men only would think of fortifying. The island is divided by a channel about thirty feet wide; the northern is called the Catalina, and forms a beautiful bay on the west, which is the place where we anchored, and is named Catalina Harbor. The bottom is coral sand, and covered by a fine weed that gives to the water a remarkably green color. The low places on the shore are covered with mangroves. The hillsides, though presenting a sufficient amount of forest, are much cultivated, and groves of plantain, mangoe, and cocoa-nut trees are interspersed with the thatch cottages of the natives in every direction, and often to the summits of the hills, and at the very base of perpendicular walls of granite that lift their rifted sides into the clouds.

The scenery is imposing, and we thought we had seen worse places to spend an indefinite time in exile. We were soon scattered about the island in small parties, wherever quarters could be found. The magistrate, Mr. Taylor, who was of English descent, had in his youth spent some time in a Boston school, and retained well the impress of American character received there. Capt. Titcomb and myself made arrangements with him to become inmates of his house during our stay on the island. One of his nephews was sent off to the other side of the island for horses; and, in the mean time, we strolled along the shore to see the little village at the head of the bay. The houses and inhabitants are much like those of St. Andrews; but here the climate is more healthful, and from its having been formerly an island of more consequence and more frequented by traders, there is a class of population more intelligent. Formerly cotton was cultivated by slave labor to a considerable extent; but as that system became obsolete, the cotton fields fell into neglect, and a coarse species of grass, growing about three feet high, waves in unprofitable luxury over almost the entire east side of the island.

As soon as it was known that a physician was about to take up his residence among them, I was at no loss to find friends. While we were waiting for the horses which Mr. Taylor had sent for, I mounted one that had been led down for me from a neighboring plantation, to go and see a sick man. Half an hour's ride brought me to his house, on the crest of a hill, looking to the eastward. The invalid was an old man, who had been bed-ridden for twenty years from disease of the bones. From some of his fingers, and one of his arms below the elbow, the bones were entirely wanting. His general health was now good, and the diseased action was arrested; but he was hopelessly a cripple. The disease having left him without the use of any one of his limbs, he was unable to stand, or even to feed himself. Of course there was nothing for me to do—but to tell him so.

When I returned, the horses were waiting, and we started, leaving the baggage to go round with a boat. Mr. Taylor and his nephew took the lead; then the old Captain, with his grey locks streaming in the wind. Mr. Dill, of Orange Co., N. Y., (who had been my traveling companion on our long and eventful voyage around Cape Horn, and thus far on this one,) and myself, brought up the rear. The roads were no better than paths, and in the most wretched state—difficult to walk, and worse to ride; but the horses never knew any better, and we, after a little practice, concluded that they understood them better than we, and gave them their way, now laboring up the rocks, and now slumping through mud to their knees, while we were kept busy to avoid being swept off by trees or torn by thorns. At length, after a ride of about four miles, we arrived at the plantation. Mr. Taylor's house, built of pine boards obtained from a wreck, is on a rise of ground, which affords an extensive view of the sea to windward, and the long line of reefs, beyond which the sea was of that deep Nazarine blue of the tropical seas, and within which it was shallow, smooth, and variegated by the different beds of coral and marine plants which might make them properly called gardens of the sea. At the foot of the hill was a forest of mangroves, extending out some distance into the water, and here was his landing for boats, of which he had a number, beautifully wrought from mahogany.

The season for fruit was passed, but there can scarcely be want of food on these productive islands. Yams and cassava—a root somewhat like a parsnip, but in taste and consistency more resembling the common potato, though somewhat harder—pork, beef, and chickens, were plenty. Fish are very abundant, and a canoe could be loaded with them in a few hours. Oranges and cocoanuts are always in season; the latter are becoming an article of greater importance to them. They are sold to traders at $10 per thousand, and are produced without labor, which is a great desideratum with these people.

Some of the young men about the house were sent off to shoot some pigeons, and we proceeded to make ourselves at home. Plans were laid for excursions to hunt in the mountains, and fish for coral and shells on the reefs. Hammocks were stretched across the first story of the house, where we were to lounge by day when weary, and sleep at night. The pigeons were delicious. They are of a dark blue plumage, with white feathers on the head. Mrs. Taylor, who, by the way, was not so light colored as the standard of taste with us at the north requires to be the wife of a white man, proved herself an excellent cook, and the other matter was no business of ours.

The next day the island was thrown into a little commotion by the sound of the conch shell, used as a signal when a vessel is in sight. It was known over the whole island at once; but the vessel passed at a long distance, and the population settled down again into their accustomed tranquility. They are a peaceable, happy people; and though they seem to esteem it a blessing to be whitish, they do not seem to feel it any degradation to be dark skinned. I thought, if I were a free black man in the United States, I would go to this island, and make it my home. The chief source of wealth is in the turtle fisheries, which, during the spring months, employ nearly all the male inhabitants. These turtles frequent all the keys and reefs in these seas, and feed on the grasses growing amongst the coral. They are decoyed into nets by an imitation of the turtle in wood. Each tortoise furnishes nearly eight pounds of shell, which is sold for about four dollars per pound. The flesh of this turtle is not used for food, being poisonous.

I chose an early occasion to visit the fortress on Catalina, and landed at the foot of it in a small canoe. After surveying the work as well as I could, I determined to scale the bastion in front, as presenting the least difficulty. The last part of the feat was performed with the fingers and toes, uncontested except by great numbers of lizards, which are as common in all these warm countries as spiders at home. Many heavy guns were scattered about the place, and it is a wonder how they were raised to their present position. The summit is overgrown with a species of locust, very abundant on the island, and known as the cockspur, from the peculiar shape and size of its thorn. This thorn is inhabited by a venomous little insect, called the cockspur ant, which is sure to resent the slightest assault upon its thorny dwelling place. I recognized it as the same insect whose bite poisoned me severely while rumaging the ruins of the Castle at San Carlos. Besides this there are no poisonous insects or reptiles on this island. Dogs run wild in the mountains, and are said to be troublesome. Formerly rats were so numerous that a species of large snake was introduced from the main land for their extirpation, since which the serpent itself has been very destructive to the young chickens; and doves, which were numerous on the island previous to this, are nearly exterminated.

On Sunday, 19th of January, while enjoying our morning siesta, calculating the problem of chances and probability of ever again seeing our native land, a messenger arrived from the west side, informing us that the schooner had returned with the men from the wreck. We accordingly mounted our horses, and rode down to the bay. There we found the Polly Hinds at anchor, and the men that I saw last on the wreck were rejoicing at the privilege of once more treading the solid earth. The schooner found it necessary to discharge part of her cargo, and take in more water. Orange bins were emptied into the sea, and bags of cocoa were landed, until she could carry her passengers safely. We made an arrangement for the cabin of the schooner for our party, and were in an exuberance of spirits, having a fair prospect of seeing home. While the schooner was taking in water, I hurried to find some shells, &c., as momentos. I wandered along the shore of the bay for two or three miles, and sat down under the shade of a tree to sketch an outline of the scenery, which seemed to have no rival for that harmonious combination of land and water, mountain and valley, the rich green of the groves, glowing in sunlight, and the rough grey of precipitous rocks, in deep shadow. Near me, scattered upon the ground, I noticed a small yellow fruit, and as I had heard of a species of wild plum on the island, I tasted of it. Perceiving nothing disagreeable in the taste or in its effects, I soon after ate one, and thought no more about it for half an hour, when a sensation of heat began to be felt, not unlike that from pepper. This soon became so insufferable that I returned to see some of the natives, and learn what it was that I had eaten, taking a specimen in my hand. I entered a hut where a half dozen natives were, and they were greatly alarmed that I had eaten the manchineel, whose very juice, they said, would cause a blister on the skin, and to sleep under the tree often caused death. They all ran for oil, sea water, milk, &c. I concluded to submit to their treatment, as it was a poison which they were best acquainted with. I had heard, indeed, of the manchineel as a deadly poison, and was not a little alarmed to think that that should unfortunately be the first thing that I had ventured to taste without knowing its properties which should have been the last. They all returned unsuccessful, except the one who went for sea water, and that I had already used freely to allay the burning. I went on board the schooner, and "turned in." Towords morning I was seized with violent vomiting and purging; at the same time my mouth and throat were excoriated and swollen, and the act of swallowing was attended with excruciating pain. This continued during the day without abatement. In the mean time, the schooner with a fresh breeze, was keeping her lee scuppers under water, which floated the wood about her deck. It was not until three days that I was able to take food, and feel again to enjoy the sea.

In three days and six hours from the time our anchor was up, we were off Cape San Antonio, the west end of Cuba. We coasted along the north shore, with light winds, until near Havana, when we crossed to Key West, passed the reef without knowing it, and without a pilot, and entered the harbor by a new route on the 31st of January. One of the men who came from the wreck died the morning that we arrived, and was buried at sea. He was a man who came in the skiff from the wreck the last trip it made between the wreck and the boat of the "Mechanic," and was compelled, by being fired upon with a revolver by the mate, Mr. Suttor, to return to the wreck with the skiff, in the effort to do which he was swamped, and with great difficulty rescued by the men on the wreck. He was taken down that night with the effects of cold and fright, and was now dead. I was anxious to have him taken into port, for the purpose of having a coroner's inquest held; but he was buried without ceremony, with a grind-stone tied to his feet. At Key West the wrecked men were set on shore, and we continued on our voyage to Baltimore, where we arrived on the 10th of February. The captain of the "Mechanic," after we left him, thought it was best for him to abandon his enterprise to Serrana, and get to the termination of his voyage as soon as possible. He reached New Orleans on the 2d of February. Of the passengers of the Martha Sanger, left on the island of Old Providence, I have never heard, though we informed the collector at Key West of their situation, and delivered a petition to him for aid.

If I have succeeded in giving as interesting a detail of the events of my wanderings as I am conscious I have a truthful one, it is the only reward I have sought; and if I have not said enough to discourage the passion for adventure, I have a chapter reserved for private use, which could hardly fail to make one contented with the plainer and more healthful charms of our northern homes.

THE AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

Our notice, last week, of the meeting of the Am. Anti-Slavery Society, covered only the morning and afternoon sessions of Fourth-day. In the evening a resolution—"No union with Slaveholders"—was discussed by J. W. Walker, Henry C. Wright, and Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

On Fifth-day, the morning session was principally occupied with business matters. James M. McKim, of Philadelphia, made some interesting statements relative to the operation of the Fugitive Slave Law in that city, and subscribed one hundred francs to the funds of the Society on behalf of Hon. Victor Schoelcher, of the French National Assembly. Just before the session closed, Mr. Garrison offered a resolution in favor of a dissolution of the Union, upon which Parker Pillsbury made a very able and very ultra speech. In the afternoon, Abby Kelly Foster, by request, made a statement in relation to the financial affairs of the Society, and urged the duty of contributing more liberally for its aid. She was followed by Messrs. Garrison, McCluer, and Wm. H Burleigh, on the same subject. In the evening every seat and standing place in the house was occupied. Edmund Quincey made a speech on the dissolution of the Union, which is characterized as "of great power, and surpassing beauty." Gerrit Smith was then loudly called for, and spoke briefly in relation to the mission of George Thompson, whom he called upon to take the stand. Mr. Thompson complied, and held the attention of the audience to a late hour, depicting the sin of slaveholding, and denouncing those who apologize for it.

On Sixth-day, Mr. McKim made further statements in relation to slave-catching in the vicinity of Philadelphia. Wm. Goodell made on excellent speech, setting forth the guilt of the churches, and urging political action for the abolition of Slavery; he said that already, in New York State, he could count by scores independent Christian Churches who owe no allegiance but to God, and who utterly repudiate Slavery, War, and every other sin. Remarks were also made by Messrs. Thomas Whitson, Frederick Douglass, H. C. Wright, S. May, Jr., W. H. Burleigh, Prime, Charles Sedgwick, Geo. Thompson, and others. The Convention adjourned near midnight.

ELD. ALFRED BENNETT, a venerable minister of the Gospel, who has long been identified with the benevolent oparations of the Baptist Denomination, died at his residence in Homer, N. Y., on the 10th inst. For nearly a year his health had been declining, and since last fall he had been entirely laid aside.

☞ The General Agent of the Publishing Society expects to attend the meetings of the Eastern, Central, and Western Associations. During the interval between the meeting of the Eastern and Central Associations, he intends to visit Oneida, Lewis, and Jefferson Counties. He hopes that persons in these localities who may have business with the Recorder office will avail themselves of this opportunity to transact it.

THE CASE OF WM. L. CHAPLIN.

The Chaplin Committee have issued a pamphlet, entitled, "The case of Wm. L. Chaplin; being an Appeal to all Respecters of Law and Justice, against the cruel and oppressive Treatment to which, under color of Legal Proceedings, he has been subjected in the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland." The facts of this case are already familiar to our readers. While temporarily residing at Washington, in August, 1849, Mr. Chaplin was induced, from motives of the purest philanthropy, on leaving that city, to take into his private carriage two young men, slaves, an earnest representation being made to him that they might thus obtain that dearest boon on earth, LIBERTY. As he drove out of the city, under cover of night, he was intercepted by an organized gang of men, knocked from his seat by a heavy club, thrown on the ground, and trampled upon, barely escaping with his life. He was then bound with cords, and forthwith committed to jail, where he remained until he could give bail to the amount of $6000; at which time, instead of being released, he was delivered up on a requisition from the Governor of Maryland, to be tried in that State on a charge of attempting to kill the men who arrested him. He was hurried to the jail at Rockville, his bail was fixed at the enormous sum of $19,000, and there he remained until he could raise that sum in cash, to be paid at the moment he was allowed to leave his cell. Yet, after the payment of his ransom of $25,000, to prevent his being lynched before he could get out of Maryland, it was necessary that Mr. Chaplin should travel incog., and in the stealthiest manner. And still the slaveholders are not satisfied; for it is said that Mr. Chaplin is to be demanded as a fugitive from justice, and that the vast sum extorted from him in the name of bail is to be spent in attempting to recover possession of his body! The pamphlet gives a detailed account of the whole affair, showing most graphically the cruelty of slave-holders and slave-laws.

ENGLISH ESTIMATE OF PRO-SLAVERY MINISTERS.

Several clerical associations in England have resolved not to invite pro-slavery ministers from the United States to occupy their pulpits. A correspondent of the Independent says that at the recent half-yearly meeting of the ministers and messengers of the associated Congregational churches of Gloucestershire and Bristol, the business of the Union and of the Home Mission having been attended to, there was a long and serious discussion of the question of American slavery, with special reference to the dishonor done to Christianity by the position taken by so many of the American ministers. The following resolution was proposed and unanimously adopted:—

"That the grief and shame which we have long felt on account of the slavery which prevails in several of the United States of North America are greatly aggravated by the fact, that not a few Christian churches and Christian ministers, so called, plead for the continuance of that wretched system; that our sorrow has been recently still further deepened by the atrocious 'Fugitive Slave Law;' which the Legislature of the United States has enacted; that, while it would give us pain to do any thing that should even seem to be inconsistent with international and Christian hospitality, especially toward our transatlantic kinsfolk, during the approaching Congress in London, we deem it right to express our unanimous determination not to welcome to our pulpits any minister of religion, whatever may be his reputation in the States, who hesitates to avow his abhorrence of slavery, and his earnest desire for its speedy abolition; but that, on the other hand, we regard those American ministers and others who, in their own country, boldly declare their anti-slavery principles, to be worthy of 'double honor.'"

MONEY FOR BENEVOLENT PURPOSES.—The following table shows the receipts of several of the principal benevolent societies, having their head quarters in New York, for the year ending with April last. The American Board's report, however, is for only eight months, and the Christian Union's for eleven months. Of the American Tract Society's receipts, $200,720 30 was for tracts and volumes sold.

THE ERIE RAILROAD CELEBRATION.—The daily papers for a week past have teemed with accounts of the Presidential Tour and the Erie Railroad Celebration. Third-day of last week, Mr. Fillmore and all of his Cabinet except Mr. Corwin, were in New York city, where there was a great procession and display of course. On Fourth-day, in company with a large number of distinguished persons, they proceeded by the Erie Railroad to Elmira, where there was plenty of feasting, wine-drinking, and speech-making. On the following day they went to Dunkirk, where a grand barbecue came off. Subsequently, the company were conveyed to Buffalo, in charge of the authorities of that city.

FUNDS FOR THE COLONIZATION SOCIETY.—It is said that a bill which passed Congress in the last hours of the session, will give to the American Colonization Society about $39,810, for taking care of 750 slaves captured by a government vessel on board the Pons, which sailed with 900 slaves from Calienda for Brazil. They were carried to Monrovia, and there provided for by the Colonization Society. Of the 900, 150 were taken into slavery. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay a sum not exceeding $50 for the care of each.

The steamer Cambria arrived at Boston on the 15th inst., with European news to the 3d.

The all-absorbing topic in England is the Great Exhibition, which was opened by her Majesty on May Day, in presence of 30,000 persons, without disorder or accident.

On the 2d the Russell Ministry was defeated on a motion by Mr. Hume to confine the operation of the Property Tax to one year.

The Jewish Disabilities Bill was read a second time, having in its favor a majority of 25.

A serious accident on the railway between Chester and Manchester, which resulted in the loss of several lives and forty wounded, occurred on the 1st inst.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has issued an official confession of the failure of all the measures taken to diminish and remove the heat of religious animosities in that unhappy Island.

In France there are stereotyped rumors of trouble ahead.

Accounts have been received via Spain, that the garrison of Oporto rose on the 24th ult., in consequence of the arrest of a number of officers and soldiers, and declared for Marshal Saldanha, after a combat of two hours.

Under the head of Emigration to America, an English paper says that the rush across the Atlantic continues with unabated vigor. A Nenagh paper states that the once populous district of Thurles and various other parts of Tipperary appear to be almost totally deserted. A letter from Waterford mentions that five emigrant ships, freighted fully with 2,000 souls, left that port for America on the 22d ult; and on the 24th another large vessel, laden with emigrants, sailed for the same destination. Accounts from the West are even more startling. A Magistrate and land owner in the county of Mayo, speaks in terms of the utmost alarm at the prospect of the country being left without sufficient hands to till the ground. From Westport and Castlebar, shop-keepers, farmers, and able-bodied laborers, are flying as if from the plague. The Tuam Herald, referring to the movements in the County of Galway, says: If the tide of emigration proceeds with the rapidity which has marked its progress during the past Spring, this Province bids fair to become a wilderness.

The World's Fair.

A letter from Horace Greeley to the New York Tribune, dated London, May 1st, gives some account of the opening and appearance of the World's Fair, from which we copy a few paragraphs.

"The show is certainly a great one—greater in extent, in variety, and in the excellence of a large share of its contents, than the world has hitherto seen. The Crystal Palace which covers and protects all is better than any one thing it contains. It is really a fairy wonder, and it is a work of inestimable value as a suggestion for future architecture. It is not merely better adapted to its purpose than any other edifice ever built could be, but it combines remarkable cheapness with great and varied utility. Depend on it, stone and timber will have to stand back for iron and glass hereafter to an extent not conceivable. * * *

"The display from different countries is very unequal, even in proportion: Old England is of course here in her might; France has a vast collection, especially of articles appealing to the taste or fancy; but Germany and the rest of the Continent have less than I expected to see; and the show from the United States disappoints many by its alledged meagerness. I do not view it in the same light. * * * *

"There are many good things in the American department. In Daguerreotypes, it seems to be conceded that we beat the world, when excellence and cheapness are both considered—at all events, England is no where in comparison, and our Dagurreotypists make a great show here. New Jersey Zinc, Lake Superior Copper, Adirondack Iron and Steel, are well represented, either by ores or fabrics, and I believe California Gold is to be. * * *

"The Official Catalogue of the Fair is just issued, and extends to 320 double-column octavo pages. . . . . The whole number of Exhibitors cannot be less than Ten Thousand, and is probably nearer Fifteen Thousand; and as two articles from each would be a low estimate, I think the number of distinct articles already on exhibition cannot fall below Thirty Thousand, counting all of any class which may be entered by a single exhibitor as one article. Great Britain fills 136 pages of the Catalogue; her Colonies and Foreign Possessions 48 more; Austria 16; Belgium 9; China 2; Denmark 1; Egypt 2½; France and Algiers 35; Prussia and the Zoll Verein States 19; Bavaria 2; Saxony 3; Hesse, Nassau, and Luxemburg 3; Greece 1, Hamburg, 1, Holland 2, Portugal 3½, Madeira 1, Papal States ½, Russsia 5, Sardinia 1½, Spain 5, Sweden and Norway 1, Switzerland 5, Tunis 2½, Tuscany 2, United States 8½. So the United States stands fifth on the list of contributing Countries.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—We learn from the Saratoga Whig, that the store of John A. Drake, of the village of Saratoga Springs, was entered on Monday night, and robbed of about $7,800, which Mr. D. had collected and received for goods within a few days previous. Some $7,605 of this money, (consisting of Bank bills on different Banks,) was done up in one package, and placed on a chair by the side of the bed, and a pair of pantaloons laid over it; the balance was in a wallet in the pantaloons pocket, which was taken, together with another pair of pantaloons and contents. The room from which the money was taken is situated in the second story of the building, in which four clerks and assistants were asleep at the time of the robbery. It is supposed the lock of the front door was picked, as the door was found open on the next morning.

We learn from the Cleveland True Democrat, that Hon. J. R. Giddings met with a severe accident on Friday. He fell from a wagon and broke two of his ribs. Though severely injured, his situation is not regarded as dangerous.

SUMMARY.

Y., on the 9th inst., on his way to Cooperstown, having in charge Stephen Barton, Jr., of Oxford, Mass., charged with being concerned in the robbery of the Otsego County Bank, whom he arrested at that place on a requisition from Gov. Hunt. Otis Larned was also arrested, about the same time and place, and was left in charge of officers who will bring him on. They have been selected for this duty at the request of Mr. Barclay, the British Consul at this port, who pays them for their services, and also pays their expenses.

A severe and destructive hail storm occurred at Worcester, Wednesday, May 14. The hail stones were as large as bullets, and came in torrents. At the Lunatic Asylum 1,000 panes of glass were broken, and every house in the town exposed to the storm, was more or less damaged. The injury to the fruit trees and vegetation will not be very great. At Grafton, an adjoining town, nearly every pane of glass was broken.

Henry Sly, a resident of Elmira, Chemung Co., N. Y., arrived in this city a few days since, for the purpose of taking passage for California, but unfortunately, on Sunday night, while on an excursion about town to look at the sights, he became somewhat intoxicated, and concluded to take a nap upon the sidewalk in West-st. He had at the time $395 in gold coin, and an elegant gold watch, in his pockets. His situation was soon observed by a gang of thieves, who at once sounded his pockets, and relieved him of his treasure and watch.

Thomas W. Dorr has been restored to citizenship by the R. I. Legislature, without taking the oath of allegiance to the State. He was enfranchised in the Senate by a vote of 18 to 11, and in the House 39 to 38, those voting in the negative considering this movement unnecessary, as at any moment he could have been restored to citizenship by taking the oath of allegiance to the State.

They lie in 172 deg. 56 min. west longtitude of the meridian of Paris, and 9 deg. 38 min. south latitude. They are from 25 to 30 in number, three of them of some extent, and all covered with cocoanut trees. On the same day he discovered the Isle Clarence.

The Caddo (La.) Gazette says that two days of the recent session of the District Court were consumed in the trial of the suit of Saunders vs. Shaw—an action brought by a Miss Saunders against Wm. C. Shaw, to recover damages for slander and defamation of character. The case having been most ably argued for both plaintiff and defendant, was submitted to the Jury, who, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of $12,000 in favor of the plaintiff!

Buenos Ayres is the scene of some dark deeds. It is said that on the 6th of March, twenty persons were shot at daybreak, without trial, and without religious service. Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. EDWARDS, E. A. PARK, and M. STUART, of Andover; Dr. ROBINSON and H. B. SMITH, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has beee received in the short time which has elapsed since thn union was made public, and the universal approbatiog of the measure which the publisher is daily receivin through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

TERMS.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the BIBLIOTHECA SACRA, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf with marbled edges, at $25 00.

A RIVULET'S SONG.

"Just under an island, 'midst bushes and moss,
I was born of a rock-spring and dew;
I was shaded by trees, whose branches and leaves
Ne'er suffered the sun to gaze through.

"I wandered around the steep brow of a hill,
Where the daisies and violets fair
Were shaking the mist from their waking eyes,
And pouring their breath on the air.

"Then I crept gently on, and I moistened the feet
Of a shrub that enfolded a nest—
The bird, in return, sang his merriest song,
And showed me his feathery crest.

"How joyous I felt in the bright afternoon,
When the sun, riding off in the west,
Came out in red gold from behind the green trees
And burnished my tremulous breast.

"My memory now can return to the time,
When the trees murmured low plaintive tones,
While I wasted the day, in dancing away,
Or playing with pebbles and stones.

"It points to the hour when the rain pattered down,
Oft resting awhile on the trees;
Then quickly descending, it ruffled my calm,
And whispered to me of the seas!

"'T was then the first wish found a home in my breast,
To increase as time hurries along;
'T was then I first learned to lisp softly the words
Which I now love so dearly—PRESS ON!

"I'll make wider my bed, as onward I tread,
A deep, mighty river I'll be—
'PRESS ON,' all the day will I sing on my way,
Till I reach the far-spreading sea."

It ceased. A youth lingered beside its green edge
Till the stars in his face brightly shone;
He hoped the sweet strain would re-echo again—
But he just heard a murmur—"PRESS ON!"

The Great Exhibition.

We find in the London Daily News the following account of the American department of the Great Exhibition, which cannot fail to interest our readers :—

In that part of the building devoted to the produce of American industry, the most noticeable feature is the largeness of the space allotted, as compared with the very meager show of goods. Whether this inequality will be removed by subsequent arrivals within the very few days which yet remain for preparation we are not aware, but if not it would be desirable to divide the surplus room between those other foreign exhibitors who in the neighboring compartments are complaining of undue limitation. Many of the articles sent from the States are still resting in their packing-cases, and of these, beyond the notification made in the published lists, we can give no account. Of those which have been brought to light, and are now being arranged round the walls and upon the counters and floor, utility rather than elegance of design, elaborate ornament, or high finish, seems to be the chief characteristic. There are two compartments of the building assigned to the States, each opposite the other, at the eastern end of the nave. One of these appears to be intended for the exhibition of heavy goods, and here we have various descriptions of ploughs, harrows, winnows, and other agricultural machines. Some few lathes, a planing-machine, and other articles of engineering mechanism, well finished, and in all other respects adapted for their several uses, lie scattered about here and there. Groping with the agricultural implements, a small steam-boiler and engine, a few American house-stoves, and a number of pots, pans, and other cooking utensils. By the way, of these American house-stoves, a hint might well be taken by our own stove-makers. They combine in a very small space—not larger than that occupied by an ordinary parlor grate or cottage range—a complete kitchen apparatus—oven, stewpans, boilers—all in the most compact form; and looking at the almost minute fireplace, or furnace, with which the whole is heated, it would seem that economy of fuel had been a primary consideration in the original design. But the article which attracts most attention in this compartment is a grindstone for hand-working, of a remarkably fine grit, and moving by the aid of anti-friction rollers. The curiosity of the observer, however, is excited, not because of any extraordinary peculiarity in the machine, but by an inscription which it bears, informing him that it is a present for Lord Stanley, from Massachusetts. Whether the Massachusetts machinists (Messrs. Lombard and Hall) consider the great wear and tear which Lord Stanley's keen edged satire undergoes while leader of the opposition in Parliament require the application of the grindstone occasionally, or what other hidden meaning attaches to this strange present, must be left to those who are clever in solving enigmas to discover.

Turning to the space on the opposite side of the avenue, we find several objects of interest. That which first strikes attention, both from its extent, the completeness of its arrangement, and the correctness of its classification, is Dr. Feuchtwanger's collection of American minerals, extraneous fossils, and fresh-water shells. Here we have specimens, arranged in their order, of the mineral productions of the States—copper, iron, lead, gold, silver, zinc, native cinnabar, and almost every other known metal. Some of these specimens are of extraordinary richness. There is among them a block of copper ore, brought from Algoquin, on Lake Superior, weighing 2,544 lbs., and of 90 per cent. pure metal; a block of native cinnabar, from California, weighing 31 lbs.; several pieces of argentiferous lead containing silver in the proportion of 100 oz. to the ton, and 75 per cent. of lead—these are from a vein in New Hampshire, said to be very extensive, and which it is proposed to work. Besides these, there are some crystals of grey copper, a number of specimens of California gold, generally adhering to quartz, but of extraordinary richness, the quartz in some being scarcely in the proportion of one-fourth to the pure gold.

There are also in this connection some very fine specimens of the Georgian diamond—the beryl and the topaz—every variety of American coal, and among the extraneous fossils several very perfect teeth, and other remains of the Mastodon from the caves in Kentucky. The shells, of which there are several varieties, from the fresh-water rivers and lakes, are curious only from their comparatively large size. At a short remove from this stand there is preparing what promises to be an interesting botanical display of dried flowers, the growth of the western district of New York, preserved and framed, but retaining their natural hues. Then we have a quantity of bar iron and steel, several huge blocks of iron and other ores, and a little farther on a large pyramid of curiously shaped yellow canvas packages meets the eye, which, from the inscription they bear, inform us that we have arrived at the counters where are to be shown (not tested) some of the delicacies peculiar to the tables of our transatlantic brethren. These yellow parcels, of which, at a distance, we had been speculating whether they were the policemen's staves, or the gaudy and awkward war-clubs of some tribe of aborigines, we now discover to be spiced American hams, and turning round, we find we have got into something like an Italian warehouse on the strike, with boxes of American biscuits, Indian corn and meal, dried meats of various kinds, packages of pearl starch, bottles of ink and blacking from New York, fancy soaps and perfumes from Philadelphia, parcels of American lustre, which we suppose means black lead, rush brooms and brushes, buckets, and a number of other articles of a similar character from other States, all lying about or heaped up one upon the other in the most chaotic disorder. A printed placard on the outside of one of the unopened boxes composing this confused mass is worthy of notice, as showing the anxiety of Brother Jonathan to drive forward the trade in Indian corn, which as far as regards this country, has hitherto lagged, we believe. The inscription tells us the box contains recipes to be circulated gratuitously for cooking Indian meal in various ways as used in the States. Extracting ourselves with some difficulty from this labyrinth, we came to several bags of American cotton wool from the Southern States; and a little farther on we find a glass case containing some specimens of manufactured cottons in prints and other fabrics. Of these, though they are very creditable evidences of the progress of American manufactures, our friends on the other side of the Atlantic will pardon us for saying that they are not of that high class of goods—especially the prints—that our Manchester manufacturers need fear their competition, at least for the present.

There are also here several cases of carpenters' and other tools, various articles of cutlery—the adzes, axes, and other edge tools being apparently among the best specimens of manufacturing art exhibited; some specimens of very strong and not altogether inelegant bookbinding from Philadelphia; a four wheel gig, peculiar for its beauty and lightness, contributed by Tomlinson, of New York; some whale boats; a couple of beautiful models (section only) of American clipper-built ships; a model of the bell telegraph, a substitute for the common house-bells in hotels and large establishments, and a number of miscellaneous productions, natural and artificial. In the same compartment are several pianos, one of them differing in some respects from the instruments of this country. This is a sort of double grand piano. In shape it is quadrangular, like a very large "square," but is furnished with a complete set of keys (7 octaves) at each end, so that two or four players may perform in a concerted piece at the same time on the same instrument, the advantage being, according to the statement of the inventor and patentee, Mr. Pearson of New York, a volume of tone equal to two grands. In the furniture department there is a massive four-posted bedstead, made of the yew-tree, remarkable neither for the beauty of its material nor the elegance of its design, but calculated, by its immense strength, to last for generations. A cabinet or two, a few school chairs—a great improvement upon those backless wooden forms upon which young children in our own country are compelled to sit for three or four hours together every morning and afternoon—complete, as far as it at present extends, the display in this branch of industry. In the ornamental metal department there is a pair of ormolu chandeliers, of which all that can be said is, that they are heavy copies of some of our old Birmingham designs; but, like the other articles we have alluded to, evidently made to last. In short, it may be said of the American display generally, that it is evidently the production of a new country, where the useful arts are more in request than the ornamental.

A Mine Under the Sea.

The following description of a visit to Botallack Copper Mine, in England, is from a work recently published, entitled "Rambles beyond Railroads." In complete mining equipment, with candles stuck by lumps of clay to their felt hats, the travelers have painfully descended, by perpendicular ladders and along dripping-wet passages, fathoms down into pitchy darkness; the miner who guides them calls a halt, and their exact position with reference to the surface of the "terraqueous globe" is thus described :—

"We are now four hundred yards out, under the bottom of the sea! and twenty fathoms, or a hundred and twenty feet below the sea level. Coast-trade vessels are sailing over our heads. Two hundred and forty feet beneath us men are at work, and there are galleries deeper yet, even below that! The extraordinary position down the face of the cliff, of the engines and other works on the surface, at Bottallack, is now explained. The mine is not excavated like other mines, under the land, but under the sea!

Having communicated these particulars, the miner next tells us to keep strict silence and listen. We obey him, sitting speechless and motionless. If the reader could only have beheld us now, dressed in our copper-colored garments, huddled close together in a mere cleft of subterranean rock, with a flame burning on our heads, and darkness enveloping our limbs—he must certainly have imagined, without any violent stretch of fancy, that he was looking down upon a conclave of gnomes.

After listening for a few moments, a distant, unearthly noise becomes faintly audible—a long, low, mysterious moaning, that never changes—that is felt on the ear as well as heard by it—a sound that might proceed from some incalculable distance—from some far invisible hight—a sound unlike anything that is heard on the upper ground, in the free air of heaven—a sound so sublimely mournful and still, so ghostly and impressive, when listened to in the subterranean recesses of the earth, that we continue instinctively to hold our peace, as if enchanted by it, and think not of communicating to each other the strange feeling and astonishment which it inspired in us both from the first.

At last the miner speaks again, and tells us that what we hear is the sound of the surf lashing the rocks a hundred feet above us, and of the waves that are breaking on the beach beyond. The tide is now at the flow, and the sea is in no extraordinary state of agitation; so the sound is low and distinct just at this period. But, when storms are at their hight, when the ocean hurls mountain after mountain of water on the cliffs, then the noise is terrific; the roaring heard down here in the mine is so inexpressively fierce and awful, that the boldest men at work are afraid to continue their labor—all ascend to the surface to breathe the upper air, and stand on the firm earth; dreading, though no catastrophe has ever happiness yet, that the sea will break in on them if they remain in the cavern below.

Hearing this, we get up look at the rock above us. We are able to stand upright in the position we now occupy; and flaring our candles hither and thither in the darkness can see the bright, pure copper streaking the gallery in every direction. Lumps of ooze, of the most lustrous green color, traversed by a natural network of thin red veins of iron, appear here and there in large irregular patches, over which water is dripping slowly and incessantly, in certain places. This is the salt water percolating through invisible crannies in the rock. On stormy days it spurts out furiously in thin, continuous streams. Just over our heads we observe a wooden plug of the thickness of a man's leg; there is a hole here, and the plug is all that we have to keep out the sea!

Immense wealth of metal is contained in this gallery, throughout its whole length; but it remains, and will always remain, untouched; the miners dare not take it, for it is part, and a great part, of the rock which forms their only protection against the sea, and which has been so far worked away here, that its thickness is limited to an average of three feet only between the water and the gallery in which we now stand. No one knows what might be the consequence of another day's labor with the pickaxe on any part of it."

Ivy on Buildings.

It is a mistaken idea, that ivy renders a structure damp, and hastens its decay. On the contrary, nothing so effectually keeps the building dry, as may be seen by examining beneath the ivy after rain, when it will be found that the walls are dry, though every thing around is deluged with wet. Its exuberant and web-like roots, issuing as they do from every portion of the branches, and running all over the surface on which they grow, bind every thing together that comes within their reach with such a firm and intricate lace work, that not a single stone can be removed from its position without first tearing away its protecting safeguard. In proof of this, we refer to ruins of ancient castles and buildings, for, while in those parts of the structure that have not the advantage of this protection, all has gone to utter decay, where the ivy has thrown its preserving mantle, every thing is comparatively perfect and fresh, and often times the very angles of the sculptured stone are found to be almost as sharp and entire as when first they came from the hand of the builder.

Rhubarb, or Pie Plant.

One of the most useful plants for the kitchen garden, is the rhubarb or pie plant, as it is commonly called. It is easily produced—comes in early in the season, when both green and ripe fruit are scarce, and makes a most healthy and palatable dish, either stewed with sugar, or made into pies and tarts—for the latter it is fully equal, if not superior, to green gooseberries.

To raise it in perfection, trench a piece of ground about two feet deep, turning in the strongest manures to be had, at the rate of a barrow-full to every square yard. Set the plants two feet apart, and you will have stalks as thick as your arm, and so tender as scarcely to sustain their own weight. It is the greatest feeder of all kitchen garden plants, and this is the reason why we see the great bulk of that sold in the markets, small, tough, and flavorless—the plants are starved.

A good plantation of rhubarb near a city, where powerful manures are to be had in abundance, would be one of the most profitable articles of culture. It is, I admit, already cheap, but considering the quality, very dear, and if a really good, well grown article were offered, it would drive all the poor stuff out of market, make it more generally used, and be very gratifying to the consumers. Quick Lime in Old Gardens.

A correspondent at Norwich, Ct., inquires "whether quick lime would be useful in an old and long cultivated garden, and how it operates."

Quick lime is exceedingly useful, when applied to old garden soils. Such soils are glutted with half-decomposed vegetable matter, roots and fibres of previous crops, and insoluble and inert portions of manure, so accumulated during a long time as to render the soil "sour," as the gardeners say. It acts by decomposing all such material, and combining with all excess of humors, and rendering the soil sweet and fit for the active growth of plants. Nothing so wonderfully restores the original fertility of an old and long cultivated garden, in which, though the soil has grown dark with repeated manuring and continual cultivation, many vegetables and fruits do not thrive as they once did, so quickly as a moderate dressing of caustic lime—applied when the ground is broken up, (at the rate of 150 bushels to the acre,) and to lie for a short time in that state —either in the fall or spring.

Habits of the Mexicans.

You would be surprised at the number of these Mexicans who occupy a single house some twenty or twenty-five feet square, containing a single room. But the enigma would be answered if you should pass by these houses in a pleasant evening, after the occupants had retired; for you would then see twenty or thirty men, women and children stretched out upon the ground upon a raw ox hide, in front of the house, luxurating as much in the pure air, with the broad vault of the heavens for a canopy, as an occupant of the softest bed which our most splendid mansions can furnish. All these claim to be occupants, though the house could not lodge them all. In a rancho which I visited on our march up from the coast, I observed in one corner a bin full of corn in the husk, among which was a hen sitting, while several others strutted around. There were three beds in this room, all of which were very neat and clean. While we sat chatting with the senora and her daughter a hen entered the rancho cackling, and very composedly jumped up on one of the beds, and nestled herself behind the pillow, preparatory to laying an egg. There was no floor, no chairs, a very rude table, and nothing about but the most primitive articles of furniture. Yet, on the wall hung a gaudy colored engraving of a saint, over which was something resembling a canopy, and pieces of red cotton for a curtain. I have not yet visited a Mexican hut or rancho, however rude, wherein I did not find either some gaudy print representing a holy scene, or an old and tattered oil painting with a similar representation. The people have a great reverence for any thing of this kind. [N.Y. Organ.

Plaster of Paris Cast from a Living Face.

The art of taking a good and correct likeness of a living face is simple, and the operation is frequently performed, and, with due care, very little difficulty is experienced. The practice is resorted to, in many instances, in order to preserve the true features of a friend; but, more particularly, to obtain a mould for a bust. In taking such a mould, the best position that the individual of whose face the cast is to be taken can be in, is to lie horizontally upon his back, with his hair kept behind the head by oil or paste. The eye-brows should be well greased, and, according to circumstances, the beard and whiskers. The rest of the face should be smoothly anointed with olive oil. In order that the person upon whom such operation is being performed, may have an opportunty to inhale fresh air, and breathe freely, a hollow tube is placed in each nostril, and secured by some sort of a cement which is air tight, and of sufficient strength to keep the tubes in their proper places. The face is then tightly enveloped in a smooth towel or cloth, cemented in like manner. In this state of preparation, the plaster of Paris, being mixed with warm water, is used. Care should be taken, however, that the eyes are firmly closed, and the ends of the tubes above the composition. The plaster is then spread carefully and evenly over all parts of the face, until there is a coat produced half an inch in thickness. If the plaster is rightly prepared, it will set in two minutes, and assume a hardness sufficient to be removed. From this mould, a cast of plaster can be taken by greasing it, or a cast of wax, if it be melted to a gentle moisture. Likenesses of tumors and skin diseases are frequently taken by this process, the wax casts being afterwards colored black. To make good casts in wax, the following composition is the best: white wax, 1 lb.; turpentine in lumps, 2 oz.; flake white, 2 oz.; the whole should then be colored with vermillion. This operation can be performed without the least danger of injury to the person, if due care is taken. [Arthur's Home Gaz.

The Growth of Wisconsin.

The constant influx of population into this growing State is rapidly leveling our forests and widening the bounds of our domestic happiness. A fresh spirit of enterprise seems to have been awakened among our people, and towns and cities are rising in our midst, where, two or three years since, no trace of human footsteps was to be seen, and no mark of improvement met the eye. Such is now more especially the case in Northern Wisconsin. Green Bay, though now in the onward march of improvement, and destined yet to become an important Lake City, bears date anterior to many flourishing villages of more recent origin that have rushed ahead of it in point of population. Such are Fond-du-Lac, Oshkosh, and Winnebago—and even some upon the Fox River, of scarcely four years' growth, are already nearly equal to it in population and business. We might instance several such in the valley of that beautiful stream above and below Lake Winnebago, Neenah, Menasha, Depere, and Appleton, on the Lake, and Lower Fox and Berlin in Marquette County, and Omro in Winnebago, are, at present, the most flourishing and important. Each of these towns are going ahead with unexampled rapidity. Industry and enterprise, energy and perseverance, are their watchwords. Public houses, stores, mills, mechanic shops, churches, and school-houses, are being reared throughout all the Fox River Valley; and such are the usual greetings of the hardy pioneer to the stranger, that one feels, while traveling through that delightful region, that he is indeed mingling with the sons and daughters of his own native home. The hotels are generally well kept, for a new country, and such attentions are usually bestowed upon the traveler as to render his stay pleasant and agreeable.

[Milwaukie Advertiser.

NECESSITY OF SLEEP.—Nothing is so hurtful both to the mind and body, as want of sleep. Deprived of the necessary portion, the person gets wan, emaciated, and listless, and very soon falls into bad health; the spirit becomes entirely broken, and the fire of even the most ardent disposition is quenched. Nor is this law peculiar to the human race, for it operates with similar power upon the lower animals, and deprives them of much of their natural ferocity. An illustration of this fact is offered in the taming of wild elephants. These animals, when first caught, are studiously prevented from sleeping; in consequence of which they become, in a few days, comparatively mild and harmless. Restlessness, when long protracted, may terminate in delirium, or confirmed insanity; and in many diseases, it is the most obstinate symptom we have to struggle against. By it alone, all the existing bad symptoms are aggravated; and as soon as we can succeed in overcoming it, every thing disagreeable and dangerous frequently wears away, and the person is restored to health. [Philos. of Sleep.

AN ENLIGHTENED FLOCK.—It is related of a worthy divine, whose field of labor was situated not many hundred miles from Salem, that he preached politics to his congregation for such a length of time that even the oldest church members forgot all about the gospel, and fell into a profound ignorance with regard to creeds, forms of worship, and church regulations. After the clergyman's death, the elders of his flock went to consult a celebrated divine about obtaining a successor.

"What is your creed?" asked the divine.

"Our creed?" asked the elders.

"Yes, your principles, what are they?"

"Oh, we are all Democrats but two."

"I mean, what is you rplatform, your church?"

"Oh!" exclaimed one, "that is principally oak!"

IF THERE'S A WILL THERE'S A WAY.—A glover's apprentice in Edinburgh once resolved to qualify himself for a higher profession. The relation with whom he lived was very poor, and could not afford a candle, and scarcely a fire at night; and, as it was only after shop hours that this young man had leisure, he had no alternative but to go into the streets at night, and plant himself with his book near a shop window, the lights of which enabled him to read it; and when they were put out, he used to climb a lamp-post, holding on with one hand, while he held his book with the other. That person lived to be one of the greatest oriental scholars in the world, and the first book in Arabic, printed in Scotland, was his production.

Variety.

Scions of an apple tree have been received, says the Boston Cultivator, from near Ticonderoga, New York, where alone it is propagated, bearing a kind of apple which has neither core nor seeds! The origin was as follows: The top of a young tree was bent over and covered with earth, which took root. The tree was then cut asunder, which stopped all connection with the natural root of the tree, and by sprouts which sprung from the top portion of the body, a regular top was formed, which produces this fine fruit; a beautiful red, good sized, very pleasant table apple in the fall.

Judge Burnett being applied to by an old farmer for his advice in a lawsuit, heard his case with great patience, and then asked him if he had ever put in a lottery. "No, sir," said the farmer, "I hope I have too much prudence to run such risks." "Then take my advice, my good friend, and suffer any inconvenience rather than go to law, as the chances are more against you there than in any lottery."

It is not unfrequently the case, that when we have attained the thing we had intensely longed for, we find ourselves disappointed, or at least much deceived in the amount of happiness we had anticipated; and, on the other hand, that the circumstance which we had dreaded for years, when it arrives, has frequently been found to have lost all the misery we had in our ideas connected with it.

A gentleman writing from Milledgeville, Ga., to the Philadelphia News, says:—"It is often said there are everywhere more women than men, but there is at least one instance in which the rule does not hold good, for, to the credit of the sex be it spoken, there were at the time of our visit no females within the Georgia State Penitentiary."

The Bible was first divided into chapters by Hugo de Santo Caro, a Roman Catholic Cardinal, in 1240, and the Old Testament was subdivided into verses by Mordecai Nathan, a Jewish Rabbi, in 1440. Robert Stephens, a learned printer of Paris, subdivided the New Testament into verses, during his leisure hours, while on a journey from Paris to Marseilles, in 1563.

The last sitter at a private dinner in Scotland, who had at length made up his mind that it was time to retire, announced his intention to the butler; and fancying that he saw something like a smile in the servant's face, he turned gravely round, saying, "Ah, John, I think I'll go to bed; but I'm no fou, John, mind that; I'm no' the least fou; but I'm just fatigued wi' drinking."

Jean Jaques says that when his wife died, every farmer in the neighborhood offered to console him with one of their daughters; but a few weeks after, his cow having shared the same fate, no one ever thought of replacing his loss by the offer of another, thereby proving the different value people set upon their cows and children.

A young lady wrote to her brother, who is a farmer in Ohio, to ask whether he had as good furniture now as when at home. He replied that she must not bother him with such questions, but to give her some idea of his style of living, he would state that his whole farm was wholly fenced in with black walnut.

They have taken to grinding pumpkins into flour in Massachusetts, by means of which pumpkin pies, the "peculiar institution" of New England, may be enjoyed at all seasons and in all parts of the world. The "United Society" of Shakers, at Harvard, Massachusetts, are the patentees.

Latour Maubourg lost his leg at the battle of Leipsic. After he had suffered amputation with the greatest courage, he saw his servant crying, or pretending to cry, in one corner of the room. "Jack," said he, "none of your hypocritical tears, you idle dog; you know you are very glad, for you will have only one boot to clean."

The articles sent to the Great Fair from Jerusalem, will be animal skins, wool, and hair; specimens of native weaving and raw silk; oils, earths, indigo and other dyes; olive and other woods; finished work and raw materials, in stone and marble.

The King of Bavaria has formed the gigantic design of causing to be executed a series of pictures on subjects derived from the annals of all times and nations—the whole being destined to form a sort of pictorial universal chronology.

A weaver at Bradford, England, has been for some time employed in weaving in a piece of cloth the whole of the New Testament. He has lately completed the four gospels and has made some advances in the Acts of the Apostles.

It is a singular and beautiful fact in the history of the art of printing, that the first book printed with movable types was the Bible. There was no date to it, but it was commenced in 1450, and finished in 1460, thus requiring ten years for its execution.

Some professor at Turin has discovered a detonating sugar that goes off like gunpowder. The discovery is very ancient, however; sugar that goes off was discovered long ago, by parents with a small and numerous progeny.

It is a cause of thankfulness (says a writer in the Christian Register) that the superintendents of railroads have done what they could to banish that oftentimes mispronounced word, depot, and to substitute the good English word, station.

Alfred B. Street, the poet, gives a good picture of a country school, in a single line:

"On the great cross road stands the public school, Humming like some great beehive."

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

Reply to "J. N. B"—Part 2.

> "Behold I will rain bread from heaven . . . . Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day which is the Sabbath, in it there shall be none."—Exod. xvi. 4, 26.
>
> "And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me, shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst."—John vi. 35.
>
> "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give REST."—Matt. xi. 28.

2d. The Ceremonial character of the Sabbath.

If this institution be a moral one, it certainly is, as J. N. B. contends, of permanent and universal obligation. It is not surprising, therefore, that he has labored zealously upon this point. If, on the other hand, even a positive institution, (as I hope to prove it,) it may be still obligatory; so that my own work is not accomplished by establishing this "second proposition."

A very unnecessary antithesis is made by my friend, between the function of "the interpreter" and that of "the logician." I answer, that the relevancy of construction is "the proper work" of "a sober logician," and that he alone can be a just "interpreter."

The first effort of J. N. B. in his reply, is to strengthen his previous affirmation that the Sabbath was instituted at the Creation; and here I must remind him, that even if this could be shown, it would prove nothing as to its moral character. This depends by very definition—not on the nature of the Giver, nor on the date when given—but on our own constitution, and our own reasoning processes. The inference was therefore rather hasty, that a proof of the antiquity of the Sabbath law "demolished this second proposition, and with it all the rest." A "positive" law was given to Adam; and that law which was merely "a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things," (Heb. x. 1,) might also have been given to him as readily as to Moses, and still have been no less provisional. He who commanded, might, if He saw fit, at any time repeal an ordinance—even though it were "from the beginning." "Those laws," says Edwards, "whose obligation depends merely upon God's positive and arbitrary institution, are not moral."

"God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it." (Gen. ii. 3.) "The word 'sanctify,'" says J. N. B., "is used in the sense of setting apart to the special service of God, by divine authority." He appears to have been misled by our inexact version. On the contrary, I assert—and fear no contradiction from the learned—that the word "qadash" (here used) never once in the Bible has intrinsically such a meaning. It radically signifies, "to appoint"—"to set apart"—"to devote." Its sanctity can only be inferred from the agent or the object. Things and persons devoted or set apart to the most infamous purposes, are correctly described by this word. The noun occurs in Gen. xxxviii. 21, and in Deut. xxiii. 17, in both masculine and feminine forms—"qadesh," and "qideshah." The verb occurs in Numb. xi. 18, where it partakes of the nature of a threat; (see verse 20;) in Josh. xx. 7, where nothing sacred is intended. In Isaiah lxvi. 17, the word is applied to violators of the law, &c. The word "barakh" (to "bless") is almost equally indefinite in its application. Its noun ("barekh") signifies the "knee." My friend's etymological argument is therefore worthless.

J. N. B. gives four reasons why Gen. ii. 3, is not "a prolepsis or anticipation." I agree with him. I hold that the passage is just the reverse of a prolepsis. It is not cotemporary history; it is twenty-five centuries posterior to its subject; it was evidently written after the exodus from Egypt. Of the many similar internal evidences of this, but one shall be cited. "By my name, Jehovah, was I not known to them," (the patriarchs,) Exod. vi. 3—the root of which is given in Exod. iii. 14, in direct answer to the question, "What is his name?" Is any one fanciful enough to infer, because the "name" occurs in this very chapter of Genesis, that therefore the Hebrew word "Jehovah" is older than man? or from Gen. xv. 7, that the "name" was known to Abram? "Spirit" away the letter of Exodus vi. 3, if you can!

Now, just as the historian used familiar though recent "names" in describing long antecedent events, so evidently the passage in Gen. ii. 3, is simply a parenthesis penned after the Sabbath law. It does not say (as J. N. B. seems to imply) that God "sanctified" the seventh day at that time, but merely he sanctified it for that reason—"because that in it he had rested." Its sole object appears to have been to fix the Jewish attention on the sanction of the particular time selected as a Sabbath—a sanction that for us has no significance, as J. N. B. has well remarked. (Isaiah lxv. 17.)

My friend has inferred, (by no very sober logic,) that Adam rested "the first day after his own creation;" and to my very pertinent inquiry—"from what?"—he replies: "It had better become him had he risen upward in thought to the sublime repose of the Creator over his finished work, and remembered that man was then in perfect communion of spirit with his God!" So that it appears Adam did not observe a human Sabbath after all! We are to rise upward in thought to the sublime termination of creation and remember that Adam by communion of spirit rested from—creation! And as he, of course, enjoyed this sympathetic repose equally on the next day, and so on the third, and fourth, this "first Sabbath kept by man" must have been a much longer one than that prescribed by the decalogue—indeed, it has not terminated yet! for though the "Father worketh hitherto," the Creator never yet has broken that "sublime repose." My friend's hypothesis does not avail him in the present examination.

The word "Sabbath" does not once occur in Genesis. The earliest intimation of a Sabbath-day we can discover in the Bible is in Exod. xvi. 5. It is in this chapter (verse 23) we find the first recorded Sabbath law. "In vain shall we search for even a hint, that during the twenty-five hundred years previous, man ever did keep, or ever was required to keep a Sabbath."*

"But," says J. N. B., in reply to "this bold but unfortunate assertion," "the division of time into 'weeks' or 'seven days,' is repeatedly mentioned" in Genesis. He has here confounded two things, not only different in their origin, but entirely independent; as a very brief consideration will illustrate. Time is necessarily measured by planetary phenomena. The interval from new to full moon, (fourteen days,) is almost as striking as that from sunrise to sunset. But while the "month" itself is an absolutely universal measure of time, nations of different origins have made different sub-divisions of the "new moon." Thus the Oriental nations, generally, adopted the most natural division of it into quarterings, (or weeks of seven days;) the ancient Greeks divided it into thirds (dechemera of ten days,) which was somewhat modified by the Romans; the Chinese into sixths, (of five days;) the aborigines of America, into the same. The instructive fact is, that the oriental week (of seven days) is unknown and untraced, where the division of the crescent and waning moon (each into two parts) has not formed the basis of computation! † Thus the week was evidently familiar to the patriarchs, and the Egyptians, (see last chapter of Genesis, verse 10, also verse 3,) as well as the idolatrous Philistines, (see Judges xiv. 12;) but so far from sustaining a "Sabbath," this very evidence sufficiently proves that no day of the "seven" was more holy than another. A Sabbath no more follows from an established quarter month, than it does from an established quarter year. It is dependent for its existence on positive enactment; and may be connected with any period, at the option of the lawgiver. (Levit. xxiii.) "Positive precepts," says Jeremy Taylor, are those "which depend upon the mere will of the lawgiver." (Duct. Dub. B. ii. ch. iii. 18)

In the first announcement of an intended Sabbath-day for the Israelites. (Exodus. xvi. 5,) the preparatory direction is carefully given that "on the sixth day [of an established week, doubtless,] they shall prepare that which they bring in, and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily." When this was accordingly done, the "rulers" or subordinate captains, unacquainted with the regulation, evidently considered this a violation of the previous injunction, "Let no man leave of it till morning," (v. 19, 20;) "and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses," (v. 22;) when they were informed that it was according to the Lord's command—"To morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord; bake that which ye will bake to-day," (v. 23.) On the seventh day, Moses again formally announced, "To-day is a Sabbath unto the Lord,"(v.25.) Notwithstanding which, "there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none," (v. 27.) To whom the commandment was once more proclaimed: "See, for that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath," (v. 29.) "So the people rested on the seventh day," (v. 30.

The narrative requires no comment; every circumstance contradicts the theory of a previous Sabbath law. Very shortly afterward, the institution was embodied in the fourth commandment, (Exod. xx. 8;) and Moses, in referring to the decalogue many years after, says expressly, "The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us," (Deut. v. 3.) So in Nehem. ix. 13, 14—"Thou camest down also upon Mount Sinai . . . . and madest known unto them thy holy Sabbath . . . . by the hand of Moses thy servant." No ingenuity has successfully evaded the force of this deliberate declaration. "I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness. . . . I gave them my Sabbaths to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them"—("m'qadisham")literally "that set them apart. (Ezek. xx. 10, 12.)

If it were possible to corroborate this, it might be mentioned that the early "Fathers"—almost unanimously—speak of the Sabbath as first given to the Israelites. The Talmudical writers agree that it was instituted between the exodus and the promulgation of the Decalogue. (Selden, De Jure nat. lib. iii. cap. 9.) Indeed, the great body of the Jews themselves have always claimed it as a peculiar institution, boasting of it as "their spouse, given to them before any other nation." (Wood's Bib. Dic.) The very circumstance of the fourth commandment being expressly extended to "the stranger within thy gates," sufficiently shows that it was not designed for those without the Jewish confines. Says the learned Spencer, "God gave the Sabbath, not to be observed by the human race, but by the Israelites alone." (De Leg. Heb. Rit. lib. i. cap. v. sec. 9.) The no less profound Selden holds the same language. (De Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iii. cap. 5—10.) And accordingly it always has been "peculiar to the Jew."

"Throughout all history we discover no trace of a Sabbath among the nations of antiquity." But I "have not read all history!" A universal negation is rarely (if ever) founded on personal experience or absolute knowledge. Its legitimate ground is induction; and if the assumption be hasty, it is of course open to refutation. I believe therefore that even with very limited pretensions to historical knowledge, there was no want of a becoming modesty in the universality of my denial.

But, says my friend, "The old Greek poets, Hesiod, Homer, and Callimachus, call the seventh day 'holy.'" J. N. B. has neglected "chapter and verse;" and I think will be puzzled to verify his references. In following Dr. Dwight, (not always accurate in his quotations,) he has been led into error. The nearest approach to the language I am able to find in either of these poets, is the following passage from Hesiod, distinguishing fortunate days from evil days: "These days are under the providence of Jove; the first day of the new moon is consecrated, also the fourth day, and the seventh day, for on this, Latona bore the golden-armed Apollo; both the eighth and ninth days of the crescent moon are likewise especially favorable to human affairs." (Hemerai v. 5—9.) If, from this, my friend is able to construct "a trace" of the weekly Sabbath, he is welcome to the construction. The truth is, we find no "Sabbath" even among those oriental nations, which had the hebdomade or week; but to the Greeks, the week itself was unknown—their smallest interval being the decade or period of ten days.

Since J. N. B. invites me upon classic ground, I accompany him with pleasure; and I have the satisfaction of affirming, (with a confidence which I hope is not presumptuous,) that no Pagan writer ever alludes to hebdomadal "Sabbath," otherwise than as a leading Jewish characteristic! The Roman philosopher Seneca ridicules the Jews for "wasting the seventh part of their life." (From a lost work, quoted by Augustine, "De civit. Dei." lib. vi. cap. 10, 11.) The Roman poet Horace, in mentioning the "Sabbath," at once associates it with the "curtis Judæis." (Satir. lib. i. sat. ix. 69.) Ovid speaks of "the seventh day kept holy by the Jews;" (Ars Amat. lib. i. 76;) and again he refers to the Sabbath as a "festival observed in Palestine," (ib. lib. i. [416.) In another work he uses the expressive phrase, "foreign Sabbaths!" (Remed. Amor. lib. 220.) The satirical Persius notices the "Sabbaths kept by the circumcised;" (Sat. v. 184;)—"recutita sabbati;"—an expression equally remarkable for conciseness and force. Martial in an epigram can find no more distinctive epithet for Jews than "Sabbath-keepers." (Ep. lib. iv. epigr. iv. 7.) Juvenal thought it worthy of relation that the Jews "observe their festival Sabbath." (Sat. vi. 158.) And again—"To whom every seventh day was idle." (Sat. xiv. 105.) Tacitus, the Historian, in his description of the Jews, records that "On the seventh day, it is said, they were idle." (Hist. lib. v. sec. 3.) And he vainly endeavors to account for it! Such testimonies most powerfully confirm our "second proposition." An institution thus "peculiar to the Jews," could hardly have a "universal obligation!"

My friend very kindly constructs an "argument for the ceremonial nature of the Sabbath, drawn from the fact of its incorporation with the ceremonial law of the Jews;" and as the sophism is entirely his own, I am not surprised that it should be "a non sequiter." The important fact communicated by Levit. xxiii., Exod. xxiii., Numb. xxviii., xxix., is not that of association, or "incorporation," but that of affiliation—the fact that "the Sabbath of the Decalogue" is distinguished by no single characteristic from a variety of similar festivals—which also commemorated important events—which also were celebrated with peculiar sacrifices—which also prohibited servile work—which also were "convocations"—which also were entitled "feasts of the Lord"—which also were "holy"—which also were "Sabbaths." My friend must therefore either admit that these also were "moral" institutions, or he must admit the "second proposition." I transfer to him the onus probandi.

The next point he adverts to is "the incorporation of a motive from Jewish history into the reasons for its observance." (Deut. v. 15.) To which he replies: "No such motive is found in the Decalogue itself, as originally delivered by God." If J. N. B. is disposed to contrast the two Decalogues, I will remind him, that the one "originally delivered by God" was destroyed. (Exod. xxxii. 19.) If he insists then on discriminating between them, I shall hold him to the Deuteronomy—to that second edition of the "tables" which was not destroyed. (Deut. v. 22.) We there find that the Sabbath was expressly given to the Israelite as a memorial of national emancipation. Thou was redeemed from an oppressive bondage; and "THEREFORE the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day"—for this especial reason was it instituted. The obvious explanation why this reason is not formally assigned in Exod. xx., is that the institution was then too recent to require it. Another point was in more immediate need of illustration—namely, why this memorial of national repose should be observed weekly, rather than monthly, or yearly; and why on Saturday, rather than on Sunday. "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," because that He rested after six days' labor. But the Israelites were distinctly informed that it was for them a peculiar institution, (Exod. xxxi. 13,) whereby they might know themselves "set apart," ("m'qadishkem,") by Jehovah. "It is a sign between him and you throughout your generations"—"a perpetual covenant," (v. 16)—declarations utterly devoid of meaning, if the Sabbath was then of moral and "universal obligation!" It was not any particular observance, but the "Sabbath" itself, that was the "sign" or token of their "separation." (Ezek. xx. 12.)

But not "one jot or one tittle" was to "pass from the law—till all be fulfilled." Not "one of these least commandments" was to be broken. This was true, not only of the Sabbath law, but of the sacrificial, and every other Jewish law. And when it had been all accomplished, (Col. ii. 14, 17; Heb. iv.,) then did it pass away forever, (Heb. viii. 13; ix. 11; John viii. 36,)

> "Established" and completed, not "made void,"
> Its purpose "all fulfilled," but not "destroyed."

It is still contended, that the Sabbath law is moral, because incorporated in the Decalogue. In this J. N. B. revives the non sequiter he but lately so satisfactorily exposed. If no "incoporation" can make a ceremonial law, equally true is it, that no "incorporation" can make a moral law. "The seventh day" is incorporated in the Decalogue, and yet my friend has labored vigorously to explain it away. "The seventh day of the Decalogue, I hold to be a part of the moral law of the Sabbath, but not the mere circumstance of its order or mode of designation." Be it so; at least a weekly Sabbath is by this admitted as an integral part of the law; indeed, a "weekly period" is very shortly afterwards expressly asserted by J. N. B. to be "required in the Decalogue." And he has before informed us that a "weekly Sabbath, rather than one oftener or more seldom, is not of itself obvious!" A happy description of his "moral law!" "Moral precepts," says Bishop Butler, "are precepts the reason of which we see. Moral duties arise out of the nature of the case itself, prior to external command." (Anal. p. ii. ch. 1.) If, as J. N. B. contends, the Sabbath is obligatory because commanded by the Decalogue, then can it by no possibility, be a moral law!

To the plain intimations I have produced from the teachings of Jesus, that the fourth commandment was merely ritual, (as where he justified the Sabbath reaping on the ground of hunger,) J. N. B replies: "My friend must be hard driven for evidence, when he infers from the case of David eating the shew-bread, a perfect parallel between the two laws." Hard driven indeed is he, who atttempts to evade the parallelism directly instituted by Jesus himself! Its very essence was a common character of obligation. To cite the instance of an excusable breach of an ordinance to vindicate a case where there was no breach, would truly form a pointless argument. No lesson from the Bible can be clearer than that both these cases were infractions of the literal statute; (Exod. xvi. 23; Neh. xiii. 15; that both were occasioned by the same "necessity;" that both were held excusable on the same plea; that both, in short, were violable and not moral ordinances.

If, by a strict construction, this "reaping" profaned the Sabbath, so did the very duties of "the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath." If, in obeying the requirements of the temple-service, these priests were yet held "blameless," Jesus was "greater than the temple," and therefore better justified the "profanation." If "mercy" be more acceptable to God than "sacrifice," then is he "guiltless" who places human comfort above ritual observance. (Matt. xii. 3—7.) But the Sabbath is subservient to man, yielding to his emergencies. Man is not subservient to the Sabbath, enchained by its exactions. This constitutes the very distinction between moral and positive laws. Man is made "for the observance of the moral law. On the contrary, all positive institutions were made for man." J. N. B. entitles the argument of Bishop Warburton a "specious fallacy;" but he does not venture to assail its positions.* He endeavors to obscure the distinction by a paralogism—by an application to the remote analogy of "the law of Marriage." The answer is obvious; just so much of this law as is really "moral" was not "made for man," but man was made for it—"the end of his creation being for the observance of the moral law." Just so much of "the law of Marriage" as is "positive" (as the legal form or ceremony, &c.,) "was made for man," and like the Sabbath law must be regulated entirely by circumstances.

I have adverted to the "sad nonsense" made of this striking argument of Jesus, by my friend's previous construction. He has attempted to amend it, but with slight success; and as he says, "I submit to Exodus himself, whether there is any want of logical connection" in the construction, I must in all candor say, I think it still a "most lame and impotent conclusion." The force of the declaration was not and could not be in the universality of its first branch; it lay entirely in the antithesis—in the contrasted subordination of the law and the man. With my friend, I submit our respective expositions "to every unprejudiced mind." "This much perverted quotation," says J. N. B., (modifying my remark,) was not against "Sabbatarians," but against "bigoted Pharisees!" Still, as these bigoted Pharisees certainly were not Anti-Sabbatarians, its legitimate force was against almost "the straightest sect" of Sabbatarians, by my friend's admission! and "honesty requires that it should not be employed for an opposite purpose."

But Jesus was "Lord of the Sabbath." These words import something vastly more significant than that "his authority was paramount in settling the construction!" Thus understood, "every trace of their glory vanishes." Jesus claimed to be "Lord," not of the construction, but of the institution! and being its Sovereign, could acknowledge no allegiance to it! Lord "of a 'strictly ceremonial and Jewish institute!'" exclaims J. N. B. incredulously. Yes, my friend; it was of all these ceremonial institutions that Jesus was preëminently "Lord!"

I have quoted the express assertion of Paul, that "the Sabbath days are a shadow;" reminding J. N. B. that he who affirms a limitation of its application must clearly prove it. He replies, "And I hope clearly to prove it thus. Paul is the servant of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ taught the perpetuity of the Decalogue, in even the least of its commandments, of which the Sabbath is one. This, therefore, was the doctrine of Paul!" No, my friend, you cannot prove it—"thus!" Paul's language directly contradicts your inference! (See also 2 Cor. iii. 7; Heb. viii. 13.) Jesus did not teach "the perpetuity of the Decalogue;" he taught exactly the opposite! (Matt. vii. 29; v. 21, 27; Mark ii. 28; xii. 29, 31; John v. 8; viii. 5, 7.) The assumption is a petitio principii.

Apparently dizzied and excited by the completeness of the circle he has traversed, J. N. B. exclaims, "With what astonishment would Paul, if he were now among us bodily, behold an attempt to torture his language into a direct opposition to a fundamental doctrine of his Master! What conceivable form of 'wresting the Scriptures' could be more painful to his generous spirit?" Did I delight in declamation, I might perhaps make an appropriate application; but I prefer confining myself to the argument. I feel it more agreeable, to establish such an accusation, than to assert it.

Whenever Jesus, in the course of his teachings, had occasion to sum up the great leading principles of the natural or moral law, (Matt. xix. 18—21; Mark x. 19; Luke x. 27, 28,) that institution so venerated by the ritual Pharisees—"'the pearl of days,' the blessing of this world, and the beacon light of that which is to come"—was always strangely or significantly passed by, without a single approving notice; while his very method of quotation, seemed carefully designed to discredit any idea of the Decalogue being the compendium of morality. In that mountain sermon, so remarkable for the comprehensiveness of its moral application, we hear no intimation of the necessity of keeping six days less holy than the seventh! In the corresponding summaries, we occasionally find in the Epistles, there is the same impressive silence concerning that "safeguard of virtue, that glory of religion, that pillar and prop of society"—the holy Sabbath! (Rom. xiii. 7—9; James i. 27; ii. 10, 11;) while, on the other hand, in all the catalogues of crime and unholiness, we meet with no allusion to that dark profanity, "Sabbath-breaking!" (1 Cor. v. 11; vi. 9, 10; Gal. v. 19—21; 1 Tim. i. 9, 10.) What moral law has been or could be so neglected throughout the Christian Scriptures? What moral delinquency has been or could be so wholly unrebuked? "Methinks," says Bunyan, "that Christ Jesus and his apostles do plainly enough declare this very thing; that when they repeat unto the people or expound before them the moral law, they quite exclude the seventh-day Sabbath; yea, Paul makes that law complete without it!" (Dis. on the Seventh-day Sabbath, ques. ii.)

"I take it for granted," says my friend, "that two men of average intelligence and candor, with the same sources of evidence open before them, could not come to such opposite conclusions on a question like this, unless the question were complicated with circumstances that tend to confound moral and ceremonial distinctions." I think this is clear; and I think it is equally clear, that I am entitled to "the benefit of the doubt." It is conceivable, that persons of the highest intelligence and candor should, through the resistless influence of early and continuous training, come to consider ritual observances as of inviolable obligation; (for this we sometimes see;) but it is not conceivable, that the wise and good should ever be led by "some mistaken view of Christian liberty" to deny a moral obligation; for this would be to overthrow its fundamental definition. Accordingly, "if a thousand Christian divines of the highest distinction, with Luther and Calvin at their head, were to 'break it and to teach men so,'" I claim that this would be decisive as to its "moral" character—that no amount of counteracting evidence could weigh a feather in the balance, however clearly it might establish the perpetual obligation of the law. Here is an issue, where "authority" is final. If, therefore, I can produce the concurrent sentiment of the most venerated and profound of the Christian Fathers*—of the most devoted and illustrious of the early Reformers—of the most popular and brilliant of modern Ecclesiastical Writers—then have I more than established my "second proposition," apart from the conclusive testimony I have adduced from the Christian Scriptures. EXODUS.

* Says Bunyan: "As to the imposing of a seventh-day Sabbath upon men, from Adam to Moses, of that we find nothing in holy writ, either from precept or example." (Treat. on Sabbath.)

In the language of a recent vigorous writer, "We are told of their sacrifices and prayers; of various religious observances and moral duties of life; of the exercise of hospitality; of words of counsel between friend and friend; of the intimate domestic union in the families of the patriarchs; and in all these scriptures, where private histories are thus unrolled before our eyes, is it not marvelous, is it not a miracle almost, that not the simplest mention or slightest intimation is any where to be found, of an institution which in modern days is found to be the Sun of the moral universe?"

† Hence the frequency with which "new-moons and Sabbaths" are associated together, (see 2 Kings iv. 23; 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. ii. 4, xxxi. 3; Neh. x. 33; Isai. i. 13, lxvi. 23; Ezek. xlv. 17, xlvi. 1, 3; Hosea ii. 11; Amos viii. 5.) The ancient Egyptians appear to have adjusted their weeks to the new moon, by intercalation.

* It is a subject for just exultation, to find two such minds as a Warburton and a Whateley, so exactly coinciding in this "specious fallacy." The latter, commenting on that sadly perverted declaration of Jesus, says, "He evidently means that though he made no pretensions to a dispensing power in respect of moral duties (man being made for them,) positive ordinances, on the contrary, being 'made for man,' might be dispensed with, or abrogated by the same authority which established them; viz., by the divine authority which He claimed."

* "The Fathers," says Calvin, "frequently call it a shadowy commandment, because it contains the external observance of the day, which was abolished with the rest of the figures at the advent of Christ."

BRING YOUR HEART INTO YOUR FAMILY CIRCLE.

We sometimes meet with men who seem to think that any indulgence in an affectionate feeling is a weakness. They will return from a journey and greet their families with a distant dignity, and move among their children with the cold and lofty splendor of an iceberg, surrounded by its broken fragments. There is hardly a more unnatural sight on earth, than one of those families without a heart. A father had better extinguish a boy's eyes than take away his heart. Who that has experienced the joys of friendship, and values sympathy and affection, would not rather lose all that is beautiful in nature's scenery, than be robbed of the hidden treasure of his heart! Cherish, then, your heart's best affections. Indulge in the warm and gushing emotions of filial, parental, and fraternal love. God is love. Love God, everybody, and everything that is lovely. Teach your children to love; to love the rose, the robin; to love their parents; to love their God. Let it be the studied object of their domestic culture to give them warm hearts, ardent affections. Bind your whole family together by these strong cords. You cannot make them too strong. Religion is love; love to God, love to man.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

I was a wandering sheep,
  I did not love the fold;
I did not love my Shepherd's voice,
  I would not be controlled:
I was a wayward child,
  I did not love my home,
I did not love my Father's voice,
  I loved afar to roam.

The Shepherd sought his sheep,
  The Father sought his child;
They followed me o'er vale and hill,
  O'er deserts waste and wild;
They found me nigh to death,
  Famish'd, and faint, and lone;
They bound me with the bands of love,
  They saved the wandering one!

They spoke in tender love,
  They raised my drooping head;
They gently closed my bleeding wounds,
  My fainting soul they fed;
They washed my filth away,
  They made me clean and fair;
They brought me to my home in peace,
  The long-sought wanderer!

Jesus my Shepherd is,
  'Twas He that loved my soul,
'Twas He that wash'd me in his blood,
  'Twas He that made me whole;
'Twas He that sought the lost,
  That found the wandering sheep,
'Twas He that brought me to the fold—
  'Tis He that still doth keep.

I was a wandering sheep,
  I would not be controlled;
But now I love my Shepherd's voice,
  I love, I love the fold!
I was a wayward child,
  I once preferred to roam,
But now I love my Father's voice—
  I love, I love his home!

ANECDOTE OF ANDREW FULLER.

No man was more free from ostentation and love of display. We will venture to affirm, that a desire to shine, or to be thought a great man, was never for a single moment cherished in his breast. Whatever was to be done, was to be done for its own sake and for the Divine glory, and was always accomplished under the great Taskmaster's eye. Never could any man adopt his own language with more propriety: "Sir, I am a man who fears God." He abominated conceit and show in others, and certainly never sought that men should admire him. When Dr. Ryland once asked him in reference to the diploma which Dr. Dwight had sent him of D. D., "Well, Bro. Fuller, did you never once feel a temptation to be called 'Doctor?'" "Why, yes," replied he, with a smile, "I once called myself so. I was traveling, and had engaged a seat inside of the mail, when a young upstart collegian insisted on taking my place. I was quietly determined not to surrender; at length, in a towering passion, the young man looked in my face, and asked, 'Who are you, sir, that you insist on having this seat?' 'The Rev. Dr. Fuller, sir.' 'I beg your pardon, Doctor,' said the collegian, and immediately ascended on the outside."

He has been heard to regret, however, that even on such an occasion he made use of the title. Every reader, however, will forgive the act, both for the sake of Mr. Fuller's comfort, and the young man's mortification. [Christian Times.

A NEGLECTED SCRATCH!

An Indiana clergyman lately told a story about a man with whom he boarded when a college boy. The man was at his work one frosty morning, and happened to get a slight scratch on the back of his hand. A single minute's attention to it would have caused it to heal in a day or two. It was neglected. A slight inflammation appeared, which a simple poultice would have reduced, but it was neglected. The whole hand became inflamed, and should have had the best medical attention, but it was neglected. The arm, and shoulder, and back were seized with pain, and now all was alarm and confusion. Twelve physicians were soon in attendance to consult upon the case. The question was, whether cutting off the limb would save the man's life, and it was decided to be too late! The disease had gained a mortal hold, and no human skill could arrest it. A vicious habit—an indulged little sin—a neglected duty—how easily are they taken care of, if we are in season with them, but how stubborn and ruinous they become, if they are let alone!

SENDING OPEN LETTERS.

Illustration of Nehemiah 6: 5.

> "Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me, with an open letter in his hand."

It is said that the modern Arabs and Persians roll up thir letters and fasten them at the ends; and in Turkey letters are usually sent to persons of distinction in a bag or purse; to equals also they are sent inclosed; but to inferiors, or those who are held in contempt, they are sent open, or uninclosed. This may account for Nehemiah's answer to the letter, which was not very courteous, as it charged Sanballat with deceit and lying. "Then I sent unto him, saying, there are no such things done as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart."

CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

Among the prisoners taken captive at the battle of Waterloo, there was a Higlander piper. Napoleon, struck with his mountain dress and sinewy limbs, asked him to play on his instrument, which is said to sound delightfully in the glens and mountains of Scotland. "Play a phibroch," said Napoleon, and the Higlander played it. "Play a march;" it was done. "Play a retreat." "Na, na," said the Highlander, "I never learned to play a retreat!" No retreat! should be the motto emblazoned on the standard of every Christian warrior, as he goes forth to battle, "not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

Ephes. 6: 13—Wherefore, take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, May 29, 1851.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

The hurry incident to getting ready for a journey requires that we should be as brief as possible in our notice of "Exodus," this week.

Anxious to maintain his point, that the Sabbath was not instituted till the falling of the Manna, (Ex. xvi.,) he asserts that "the word 'Sabbath' does not once occur in Genesis." So often do anti-sabbatarians bring up this argument, that one would suppose they thought it to possess some weight. We do not know that any one ever maintained that the noun was found in Genesis, but the verb is there without doubt. "He rested on the seventh day." And it is the day of the rest which the Fourth Commandment requires to be remembered and kept holy. But because "Exodus" does not find it in so many words, "Keep holy the day of the rest," till after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, he concludes that Adam and the Patriarchs did not consider it their duty to keep it. We think that on this point his opponent has answered him very conclusively, and his attempts to explain away the force of the answer, though evincive of much ingenuity, are, in our opinion, any thing but successful. The fact that God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, are not admitted by him as proving any thing, for "it does not say that God 'sanctified' it at that time, but merely he sanctified it for that reason,—'BECAUSE that in it he had rested.'" But if the act of blessing and sanctifying the seventh day did not take effect at that time, for what earthly reason is the fact brought to notice in the second chapter of Genesis at all? "The passage is simply a parenthesis," says our author. But why was such a parenthesis thrown in? If "the sole object was to fix the Jewish attention on the sanction of the particular time selected as a Sabbath," and that sanction was one which had no significance for any but Jews, it was time enough to call attention to it when speaking of the first institution of the Sabbath. To call attention to it, when writing the history of what occurred twenty-five hundred years before, appears awkward and out of place. We wonder that it does not strike "Exodus" himself as a clumsy digression. It would, if it were not necessary to help a foregone conclusion.

His etymological criticism upon the words "sanctify" and "bless," is all so much truth, which nobody cares to dispute, but in regard to the argument it amounts to nothing. The most that can be said of it is, that it helps the geometry of his article by making a paragraph.

Of the facts connected with the falling of the Manna "Exodus," it strikes us, makes somewhat of an unfair use. The fact, that on the sixth day of the week the people prepared that which they brought in, and it was twice as much as they gathered daily, is considered to have been in accordance with a "preparatory direction carefully given." He supposes that when this was done, "the 'rulers' or subordinate captains, unacquainted with the regulation, considered it a violation of the previous injunction, "Let no man leave of it till morning," and complained to Moses accordingly. That this opened an occasion for Moses to inform them, that it was all done in accordance with the Lord's command; and that on the seventh day Moses again informed them, that it was the Sabbath which God had given them. In this way he makes it appear that the matter took the people by surprise, and so frames a plausible argument that the Sabbath was at that time an institution entirely new. But if the rulers or subordinate captains knew nothing about the "preparatory direction carefully given" to gather twice the usual quantity on the sixth day, how happens it that the people were aware of it? For the people are represented as gathering on the sixth day twice the usual quantity, (v. 22.) Our friend's construction represents the subordinate captains as more ignorant than the people themselves, and as entering a complaint against them to Moses, under the false impression that they were in a state of insubordination. Surely, if the preparatory direction was so carefully given, the "rulers" must have known it as well as the people; and their coming and telling Moses was not in the way of complaint, but rather by way of informing him that the people had attended to their duty, and to receive direction what disposal to make of the extra supply. But the truth appears to be, that the quantity of Manna which fell every night was just about enough to supply each man of the congregation for one day. For when the people gathered it, "some more and some less," they put it into one heap. And when it was afterward measured with an omer, there was found to be just an omer full for each man. "He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack." But on the sixth day it was different. Twice the usual quantity fell on that day. It was not merely that the people gathered more on that day, but that there was more to gather. And, on every other morning, the only way in which the previous injunction, "Let no man leave of it till morning," could be violated, was, not by gathering an extra quantity, but by reserving of that which they had gathered. It was this reservation, which caused it to spoil, and rendered Moses angry.

Neh. 9: 13, 14, is quite conclusive to the mind of "Exodus," that the Sabbath was unknown till the time of Moses. But the language in that place does not necessarily imply anything more, than that God restored to the Israelites the knowledge of that which had been in a measure lost. No doubt that during their bondage in Egypt, the people had been compelled to disregard the holy rest, and that many of them had pretty much lost all traces of it. But to make the matter certain, the miracle of the manna was suspended on the true day.

Upon Ezek. 20: 10, 12, we have remarked on a former occasion, showing that it gives no sanction to the view of anti-sabbatarians.

The idea of "contrasting the two Decalogues is singular enough. We have no idea that, upon the Deutero-nomy, the Fourth Commandment was worded at all differently from what it was on the original tables. "I will write upon these tables the words that were in the first tables, which thou brakest." Ex. 34: 1. Deut. 5: 15, shows the special reason why the Sabbath was commanded to the Israelites, but not why it was instituted. Just as a special favor which one confers on his son, is a reason why he commands him to love him, but it is not the reason in which the duty originates.

With these hastily penned remarks, we give the article of "Exodus" to our readers.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 38.

GLASGOW, May 9th, 1851.

In the Commons, on the 30th of April, when the House should have gone into Committee on the Metropolitan Sunday Trading Bill, Members complained of the changes it had undergone in the Select Committee. Mr. Anstey recommended the House not to adopt the measure. The only clause, he said, which recognized the principle that the poor should be protected against being compelled to work on Sunday had been expunged, and the effect of the Bill would be to place the small tradesman at the mercy of policemen who were to be clothed with judicial powers not touching the wealthier classes. He therefore moved that it be committed that day six months. This amendment was seconded by Mr. B. Wall, who likewise complained of the course pursued by the Select Committee, which had precluded him from offering evidence adverse to the Bill, and urged that a measure like this should not be local, but general. Mr. Lennard also opposed the Bill, and moved that the debate be adjourned to that day fortnight; which was agreed to. Whether the Bill will at all pass, or what form it may yet assume, remains, therefore, still to be seen. One thing seems pretty evident—it will not be made more stringent; and, as it is, it fully legitimatises the principle of partial Sunday Trading in the Metropolis, and will therefore encourage the practice. Throughout the country, little has been said on the subject of Sunday sanctification for some time past, it having been, as confessed the other day in the Free Synod of Lothian and Tweedale, swallowed up in the agitation about the Papal Aggression.

The Glasgow and Edinburgh petitions to the House of Lords for repelling that aggression were presented the other day by the Duke of Argyll among a hundred similar from Scotland alone. Circumstances have contributed to expose more and more the unreclaimed and irreclaimable character of the Papal hierarchy, and the danger of trusting it with opportunities, from their being almost sure to be abused. The Talbot escape has fixed itself in the public mind, and a salutary dread is the result. So also the death-bed scene of the poor old Frenchman, Carre, showed the unscrupulousness with which Rome's priestly agents work for themselves upon the fears of their victim—although in this case also the Papacy has lost by her deeds of darkness being brought to light. After having been repeatedly before the courts, as Metaire V. Wiseman, an arrangement has been entered into between the parties by which the principal portion of Mons. Carre's property goes to his next of kin instead of to Wiseman as successor to the former Romish Vicar Apostolic in England. An action at law has, however, been raised against the Morning Advertiser and Morning Herald newspapers, for inserting paragraphs, insinuating that one of the nuns in the convent at Clapham had given birth to a child. Supposing that the charge should be proved to have been unfounded, this will not remove the scandals to which the conduct of monks and nuns in other lands has given rise. Gavassi, in London, still continues, from Sunday to Sunday, with unsurpassed eloquence to denounce the wickedness of the system with which he has so long been connected. Last month, the Rev. W. B. Stoney, Rector of Castlebar, Mayo, Ireland, presented a petition to Parliament, praying that a law might be passed rendering penal Romish denunciations at the altar, tending to excite to violence. He gave the case of a Scripture reader, in the employment of the Irish Society, who having been so denounced, the bell of the chapel was rung in the night to collect the assailants who aimed at his destruction. Six persons were convicted of the assault. When the reader was denounced, the people were told that but one week would be given them for vengeance, and, unless it were executed within that time, mass would cease to be offered. About the same time, there were posted on the chapel walls of Kilkenny, copies of a placard denouncing by name a number of persons, "strangers in this city" who had exposed the Pope and his measures. As was evidently the design, this occasioned their being mobbed and exposed, some of them, to considerable danger.

The large number of clergymen of the English Church, who have seceded from the ranks of Tractarianism to those of Rome has occasioned great annoyance to such of the leaders as have resolved to remain in the Establishment. Dr. Pussey, through whom the Church of St. Saviour, at Leeds, was built and endowed, and with whom the presentation rests, preached lately on this subject. This Church has been quite a hot-bed in preparing priests for the Papacy. The Bishop of Ripon, in whose diocese it is, promises to give an insight into its history from the first, and of the difficulties which it occasions him. But some of the Bishops occupy, on this question, a remarkable position. Thus he of Rochester, while he lately suspended for six months the Rev. Mr. Blew of Gravesend, for having subscribed an Address got-up by a party of Pusseyites to Dr. Wiseman, calling him "Your Eminence," and expressing regret for the reception he has met with in England, has since commanded the adoption of some of the Romish practices which others are seeking to put down. But of all them, he of Exeter is the most determined to carry out high church principles and practices. In the beginning of last month, he published a Pastoral Letter to his clergy, of more than 100 printed pages, in which he charges his superior, the Archbishop of Canterbury, with being a "fautor of heretical opinions," and also other of the Bishops with holding unsound doctrine—lays down the most Pusseyistic doctrine as the truth—and warns the clergy of the necessity of "teaching high Catholic truth" and the "sacramental system." He has called a Diocessan Synod, to be held on the 25th of June; and as his clergy, who number above 800, are believed to hold with him, it is not improbable the movement may lead to something important. He has intimated that Baptismal Regeneration is to be the theme for the first day of the convocation, and other two days, with such subjects as may at the time be proposed. The matter has been noticed in Parliament, and the Government has been watching to discover whether the Bishop has not in this trenched on the Queen's Supremacy. It seems, however, that although on the very border of illegality, he has yet kept within the letter of the law. An eye will, however, be kept upon him by the Head of the Church, or those who, in spiritual things, exercise her power.

"SABBATH DESECRATION"—CORRECTION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

As for "entering the field as a disputant," I have no time or inclination for such an object; but I wish to correct a mistaken idea which your correspondent N. V. Hull seems to have entertained in reference to a remark in my article on Sabbath Desecration. "That remark," which he asserts to be a "glaring misstatement of the question under consideration;" has no reference to the paragraph he has so carefully quoted, (which was not mentioned in the review,) but to the one preceding, which says, "The report was further opposed upon the ground that it was an unjust interference with the lawful business of a large class of citizens," &c. This, as he will perceive by a second reading, entirely changes the features of the supposed "misstatement." Will brother H. read again, carefully, the article in question, and "see to it" that he, at least, raises no "new issues?" My argument was not, that we may not save the milk on the Sabbath, but that it might be saved with far less labor than to make it into cheese, though perchance it might not be quite as lucrative. Your correspondent seems to infer, that because our cows must be milked on the Sabbath, the license of "saving" or "gaining" applies peculiarly to that kind of property—the justice of which inference I have yet failed to perceive. My brother admits the fairness of my intention; then where is the deceit he appears to discover? I have one favor to ask of your readers; that is, before they decide from mere assertion, to read candidly, in connection, the articles in the Recorder of January 23d, March 27th, and April 17th, on "Sabbath Desecration," and judge for themselves who has raised a new issue, and who has made "glaring misstatements," or argued deceitfully.

METHODIST CONFERENCE ON THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.—The New Hampshire Methodist Conference, consisting of some 90 clergymen, exclusive of local preachers, which held its session at Bristol, Mass., a few days since, passed a series of resolutions, reported by a Committee appointed for that purpose, expressing their utter disapproval and detestation of an unjust, deplorable law "which imposes upon the citizens of this State duties that are incompatible with the obligations and charities of the Christian religion, and puts the interests of mammon and party in contrast with, and in preference to, the highest virtues that can dignify States, and ennoble individual man." The action of the Convention was unanimous in its condemnation of the law, and in urging its repeal.

BAPTISM OF A JEW.—On the 27th of April, Rev. Dr. Janeway, pastor of the North Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, baptized a young Israelite, a native of Hungary, who was first brought into contact with the truth about three years ago, through the preaching of Dr. Duncan, Missionary to the Jews in Pesth. A number of Jews were present, apparently interested in the transaction.

CHRISTIAN BENEVOLENCE.

While, on the one hand, supreme selfishness has been, and still is, the cause of sin and misery in all their varied forms—Christian benevolence, on the other hand, acts both as a prevention and antidote to the evils of selfishness. Although benevolence atones not for past transgression, yet its universal substitution for selfishness would usher in the wished-for millennium, and makes earth a paradise. There is, however, much that is "highly esteemed among men," as Christian benevolence, which, tested by the word of God, will be found to be the legitimate product of selfishness.

The human "heart is deceitful above all things," and so it is ever ready to counterfeit each and all of the Christian graces and characteristics. The natural heart is disposed to be religious, but not inclined to be Christian. "The carnal mind is enmity against God," and consequently against all that is truly like him. The natural heart has been the same in all ages, the world over. Carnal men, whether religious or irreligious, have always hated the truth. Do any doubt it? Let history and the word of God resolve their doubts. It is written upon the historic page of every generation of man, in characters of blood—the blood of God's ancient prophets, of the Apostles, and a host of martyrs, from the martyr Abel down to the most recent victim of heathen, popish, or Protestant malice. Yea, it is written in the blood of God's only begotten Son, that carnal men—aye, and scrupulously religious men too—have hated, and do still hate, the truth, though that truth be written or spoken in the spirit of a Saviour's love. It becomes us, then, not to regard a seeming Christian grace as genuine merely because the religious world so esteem it, but to test all things by the word and spirit of truth.

There is a kind of benevolence which is, to a certain extent, beneficial in its appropriate sphere, yet very unlike true Christian benevolence—indeed, as different, intrinsically, as are selfishness and disinterested love. Selfish gratification, whether in the form of pleasure, wealth, or fame, is always the moving principle of the former; while a humble sense of duty, growing out of the discovery of our relations to God and to each other, and a love of virtue and right for their own sake, prompt the latter. To give from our abundance is human, but to give from our necessity is Christian. The most benevolent of human promptings is to bestow upon others what we do not need for our own comfort; the Christian pattern is to forego our own comforts to secure a greater good to others. True benevolence desireth not publicity, nor "the honor of men, but the honor which cometh from God only."

At the present time, the acts most highly eulogized, by Pulpit and by Press, as the most notable examples of Christian benevolence, consist, first, in large public donations from the rich, whose wealth has been accumulated, not as the legitimate product of their own labor, either of mind or body, but by the labor of others, and who continue to replenish from the same source; and, secondly, in bequests, which take no effect so long as the giver can possibly use the money for his own pleasure or aggrandizement. Yet, of all such donations and bequests, most lauded by the religious and secular press, probably not one in twenty would bear the test of the Gospel of Christ. The benevolence of public charities, (unless public of necessity,) is always doubtful, almost always spurious. How many there are, who would not fail to contribute as the box passes round in the public assembly, and who would cheerfully annex to their names a respectable sum upon the subscription book of an institution undoubtedly popular, yet who, if indeed they are susceptible of a benevolent impulse, never knew the happiness of endeavoring to render others happy.

Reader! be not deceived; a man may give much, and often, and yet have no true Benevolence.

GORDON.

WESTERLY, R. I., May 4th, 1851.

THE PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—This body commenced its session at St. Louis, last week. Various important topics were had up for discussion; among them a communication was submitted touching the correspondence between the General Association of Massachusetts relative to the action of the latter upon the subject of slavery; it was referred to the appropriate committe A memorial was presented from the Synod of New Jersey, requesting the formation of a bureau in connexion with the Board of Foreign Missions to conduct the Missions to the Papal lands, which was referred to a Special Committee. The Report of the Board of Foreign Missions was read by Dr. Lowrie, who addressed the Assembly at length upon the subject. The question of the selection of the place for the next meeting of the Assembly was then taken up. Dr. A. W. Leland of South Carolina, nominated Charleston. He did not believe any course or subject now in agitation or contemplated would prevent the meeting of the Assembly next year in Charleston. Mr. Wilson, of South Carolina, also favored Charleston. He denounced the late Charleston Convention, as irresponsible and chimerical. He did not for a moment anticipate that Charleston would be out of the Union next year. After a lengthy discussion, Charleston was selected by a large majority.

CAN'T TAKE CARE OF THEMSELVES.—A statement is going the rounds, to the effect that E. Douglass Taylor, an Alabama slave, has within a few years earned and paid for his own freedom thirteen hundred dollars, and for the freedom of his wife three hundred and fifty more. He is a licensed preacher of the Methodist Church, and has a strong letter of recommendation from Bishop Capers, of South Carolina. What a commentary upon the oft-repeated objection to emancipation, that "the blacks can't take care of themselves."

THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

This Society held its 27th Anniversary in Philadelphia on the 13th inst. From reports presented on the occasion, it appears that during the past year, the Union has employed 127 missionary colporteurs in promoting Sunday Schools in 24 States and Territories, who have established 1,394 new schools, revived 1,819 others—all embracing 24,339 teachers and 168,492 scholars. Donations of books have been made them to the amount of $17,930—making the whole expense of missionary labor and donations for the year, $45,780.

RECEIPTS—$182,840 48; of which $34,244 35 were donations, and $568 51 legacies; $142,823 78 for sales and in payment of debts; from tenants renting rooms of the Society, $2,208 84; rent of depository, $3,000. Balances from last year, $4,727 97.

EXPENDITURES—For stereotype plates, $3,964 58; copyrights and editing, $3,333 23; engravings, $2,383 40; paper, $43,459 72; printing, $14,458 85; binding, $42,821 54; Bibles and Testaments bought and miscellaneous books purchased to fill orders, $6,748 76; interest on loans, $2,581 62; loans paid, $5,000; salaries of secretary, superintendent of book store, book keeper, salesman, clerks and laborers, $8,886 77; rent of depository and officers, $3,000; taxes, $595 20; salaries and expenses of one hundred and thirty-six missionaries and agents, and donations of books to poor schools, &c., $45,780 20; miscellaneous items, $4,426 05; balance, cash on hand, $127 99.

The Society is now indebted for paper, binding, &c., $31,190 08, which added to the amount of loans bearing interest, $39,160 29, exhibits a total indebtedness of $70,350 37. The amount of stock of paper and books is $84,795 36.

Forty-six new publications have been issued during the last year, equal to 6,000 pages, 18mo.

The Sunday School Journal, published semi-monthly for teachers, and the Youth's Penny Gazette, published every other week for children, continue to receive increased patronage, and the great reduction of postage on these papers under the new post-office law, will no doubt largely increase the circulation.

No profit is derived from these papers, the subscription price merely covering the outlay for paper and printing.

The total value of publications distributed during the year $139,820 33.

A PHENOMENON.

The editor of the Cortland Democrat, in a formal valedictory, takes leave of that print for another field of labor, under circumstances which he sets forth as follows:—

"We will now give our readers an idea of our reasons for leaving them, and an account of our future occupation. You recollect, perhaps, that we gave a notice, a few weeks since, of investigating the spiritual manifestations, or commonly termed "spiritual rappings," and that we stated our belief in regard to the phenomena. We have been in Auburn since then; and upon a thorough and careful investigation of the subject, we have come to the further conclusion, that the manifestations are not only produced by spirits out of the flesh, but they are permitted and delegated to communicate with mortals by God, for the vast and inconceivably exalted purpose of redeeming the world from the bondage and corruption of sin. And as one of the feeble instruments of God in this great work, we engage our weak talents, our time and our all, henceforth and forever, until the object be accomplished.

"PAUL, the Apostolic Messenger, directed us, by means of the 'RAPPINGS,' to leave our business in this place, and remove to Auburn, there to commence and continue the publication of a paper, to be devoted wholly and exclusively to this cause. Accordingly we have disposed of our interest in the Democrat, and have purchased, in the name of Peleg S. Cottrel & Co., a printing office located in Auburn, where, in a few weeks, will be issued the first number of the paper alluded to, under the title (given also by the 'rappings') of 'Spiritual and Moral Instructor.' The paper will contain accounts of conversations with spirits, the history, defense, and advocacy of the manifestations, and articles composed and given entirely by spirits in another state of existence. It will be issued semi-monthly, at one dollar a year."

CHURCH CASE IN CHICAGO.—Some time ago, some pretty strong resolutions were adopted by the Third Presbyterian Church, N. S., at Chicago, on the subject of slavery, purporting, so far as we recollect, a determination not to continue their allegiance to the General Assembly, unless that body should take a more satisfactory position. The Presbytery of Chicago was appealed to by the dissentients, and it decided that the resolutions were "irregular and revolutionary, and a virtual severance" from 'the Presbyterian Church in the United States,' and must be rescinded. The majority of the church refused to rescind. Whereupon, the Presbytery, after an ineffectual effort to procure an amicable division of the church and property, proceeded gubernativamente to declare those who adhered to the resolution to be no longer members of the Presbyterian Church, and that the session, 'consisting of the pastor and those elders who did not vote for the resolution,' should strike off the names of all who do not recant in two weeks. It was by a similar proceeding that a disaffected minority of Dr. Cox's church were declared by the Old School to be the 'First Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn.' But we believe no property was wrested by the process, and probably will not be in this case.

RIOT IN HOBOKEN.

Monday, the 27th inst., was celebrated by the German residents of this city as the holiday of Pentecost. A large number of Germans, ten to twelve thousand in all, perhaps, crossed to Hoboken in the morning, for the purpose of joining in the festivities of the day. Everything passed off peaceably till towards the close of the afternoon, when some difficulties occurred, through the presence of a gang of rowdies belonging to this city, and known by the title of "Short Boys." They were armed, and evidently came for the purpose of assault, as they commenced without provocation, to insult the females, overthrow the refreshment tables, and destroy the property of the venders. The Germans at first attempted to avoid a collision, on account of the number of ladies and children who were present; but the conduct of the rowdies became so outrageous as not to be tolerated, and the offenders were driven off. After being driven from the Elysian Fields, the rowdies retreated towards the village, followed by the Germans, and a sort of running fight was kept up for the whole distance. On reaching the village, the rowdies were reinforced; and towards evening they assembled before the gates of the ferry, and prevented the Germans coming in from the festival from reaching the boat. About half-past six the procession came in from the woods for the purpose of returning to the city, when it was assailed by a shower of stones, the boys who were with the rowdies occupying themselves with assaulting the females, many of whom were struck and severely bruised. A violent fight then commenced, which lasted with little intermission for two hours. The rowdies were armed with guns, pistols, swords, clubs and slung-shots, and after the first attack the Germans entered the German beer-houses in the neighborhood and armed themselves. A great number of persons were severely, and some mortally injured. Many were stabbed in different parts of the body, or beaten with stones.

The Sheriff of the County was early on the ground, endeavoring to quell the riot. He made two applications to the police authorities of this city for assistance, but for some reason it was refused. He then ordered the citizens to assist him, and also ordered out the military from Jersey City. Many arrests have been made, and the parties lodged in the jail at Bergen. It is said that the jail is crammed full. The militia remained on guard till half-past 11 o'clock, when everything appeared to be quiet, and they left.

It is impossible, in the present excitement, to ascertain precisely the number of killed and wounded. There are certainly four of the former and probably fifty of the latter, some of whom will not recover. Twelve or fifteen of the rowdies were badly injured. The greatest excitement prevails among all classes of our German citizens in relation to te matter. It is the most disgraceful and infamous event which has occurred in this vicinity since the Astor-place riots.

FROM THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The French have renewed their atrocious attempts to force their priests and brandy upon the reluctant but helpless Hawaiians. The admiral has sent his ultimatum, and it was expected he would bombard the town, and the valuables were removed. A letter from Honolulu says that the first act of hostility will be the signal for running up the flag of the United States. The Alta California says:—

"This is no guess-work. It comes to us in the most positive form. It has been determined upon by the King and his Ministry that if the French attempt to blockade, or to take possession, the government will hoist the stars and stripes, and throw the kingdom upon the protection of the United States. We think our authority for saying this is perfectly reliable. The course has been decided upon in consideration of the inability of the Islands to contend against the forces which France might send against them, and also from the fact that the almost entire interests of the Islands in the hands of foreigners, are those of the Americans."

EMIGRATION TO LIBERIA.—It is now ascertained that a large number of free colored people will emigrate from the Valley of Virginia to Liberia, about the last of next month. The Winchester (Va.) Republican says:—

Mr. Bailey, the agent for the State, who has been laboriously engaged for some time past, informs us that he has on his list the names of three hundred applicants from the Valley, one half of whom he hopes to get ready for the next packet. The others can be removed at some subsequent time. A considerable proportion of the applicants are from Frederick. Many of them are from Winchester, and among them are to be found the names of several of our best colored people. A steam saw-mill, it is understood, will be taken out with them, and will be under the direction of an engineer, a respectable man of color, who successfully conducted an engine on our railroad for several years. This is an enterprise of great promise to the company, as timber of the best kind is abundant in Liberia, and lumber is in good demand for building and furniture. From 1820 up to the present time, 2,258 emigrants have been sent out from Virginia. 6,116 is the total number that has been removed by the American Colonization Society.

ROBBERY AND CONSCIENCE.—Some time since, Mr. Reynolds Carpenter, of Pownal, Vt., lost $4,000 while traveling West to purchase wool. A few days since $3,439 came back to Vermont in a package by express—the conscience-stricken sender, in an anonymous letter, saying he did not steal the money, but found or borrowed it, and being short had used the difference, which, however, he promises to make up as soon as he is able. The last that Mr. Carpenter remembers of the money, before the loss, was that he placed it in his overcoat pocket, and hung the coat across the wagon seat.

These six—the peevish, the niggard, the dissatisfied, the passionate, the suspicious, and those who live upon others' means—are for ever unhappy.

The news of the departments is remarkable for the fierce spirit of hostility exhibited in several parts by the populace against the Gendarmes, and the frequent conflicts which ensue from attempts to rescue prisoners.

The census recently taken in France shows a total population of 35,500,000. The number of foreigners domiciled, of all nations, exceeds 1,000,000; of these upward of 75,000 are English, in various parts of the country, which is considerably less than previous to the revolution, when it exceeded 150,000.

Lisbon accounts to the 3d instant convey a hope that the military insurrection in that country was about subsiding in consequence of the Duke of Terceira's resignation and the appointment of Marshal Saldanha as Prime Minister, with the Barons da Lur, de Francos, and M. Francini, for the War, Navy, and Finance Departments.

In anticipation of the meeting of the Diet on the 22d inst., the garrison of Frankfort is to be increased from 5,000 to 15,000 men at once. The corps will form the nucleus of a force which is destined to reach the number of 150,000 men, destined, according to the latest arrangements, to be kept at the disposal of the Diet.

A telegraphic dispatch, dated Vienna, 7th inst., says: "The principal bankers of the capital, MM. de Rothschild, Sina, Schaup, and Koenigswarter, have had a conference to-day with Baron de Kubeck, President of the Council of the Empire, to come to an understanding on the financial arrangements necessary to carry out the Ministerial project. The state of the finances is so uppermost in every one's mind, that the Council of the Empire has decided on opposing all political measures so long as these pecuniary embarrassments shall continue."

A correspondence of the Presburg Zeitung, dated Para, April 2, says: The ministry has at length decided on the fate of the refugees. The Porte has accordingly declared that it assumes the obligation of retaining in custody Kossuth, his wife, Count Batthyani, Nicolaus and Moritz Perczel, Asbath, Gyurman, Luley, and Wisoeky, and makes their fate dependent on further transactions with Austria. In order to effect the release of the others, an official is to be dispatched next week to Kutahia, and superintend their surrendery to the Turkish Commissioner. They will then be brought to Gemlik in a Turkish vessel, which will deliver them in the Dardanelles to an American or English ship of war. At the same time, those refugees whose banishment has been demanded by Austria, especially Dobocai and Vay, will be banished from this place. Austria has thus obtained nearly all she asked.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—A despatch, dated Philadelphia, May 20, says the steamer Ohio, from Newcastle, with about 100 passengers on board, was run into near Greenwich Point Landing, below Philadelphia, at 8 o'clock to-night, by the steamer Commodore Stockton. The Ohio was sunk and the upper deck covered in 20 minutes. Terrible consternation prevailed. Nearly all the baggage floated off and was lost. The Ohio was completely stove in. The Commodore Stockton was also severely damaged, but did not sink. There were about one hundred passengers aboard, quite a number of whom were ladies and children. It is feared that some of the latter perished. A report prevailed that one child was known to have been lost. The general belief, however, appeared to be that every soul escaped. Later accounts say that the dead body of a young man, named John Taylor, has been found on the wreck.

FOURTH OF JULY.—The Board of Managers of the Washington National Monument Society suggests to their fellow-citizens throughout the Union that collections be taken up on the approaching anniversary of our national independence, in aid of the great and patriotic enterprise in which they are engaged, wherever the day is celebrated.—The Republic says: The structure is now eighty-four feet from the surface; and, including materials, workmanship, necessary officers, workshops, machinery, &c., has cost, so far, only about $125,000, and the whole cost of the obelisk, when completed, is estimated at $552,000, which, it is anticipated, will not fail to be contributed by the patriotic people of the United States to an object so noble, and which is to evince their gratitude and veneration for the great benefactor of their country.

LATER FROM TEXAS.—The Texas papers give the following items of late intelligence:

The Indians are committing great depredations in the neighborhood of Goliad. The white man recently killed by the Indians near San Patricio was Major Pratt. Mr. Jones, the other American wounded at the same time, is not expected to recover. Col. James D. Graham, U. S. Topographical Engineer, has arrived at Indianola, en route for El Paso, whither he goes as chief of the scientific corps in the U. S. Boundary Commission. The Texas papers have news of the death of Gov. Smith, a prominent citizen of Texas. During a severe storm in the neighborhood of Victoria, the houses of Dr. Cooke and that of Mrs. Eberly, were blown down. It is reported that heavy rains have much injured the crops in the western part of Texas. About Lagrange and Petersburg it is thought that if the rains continue two weeks longer, one half of the crops will be destroyed. In Gonzales, the complaint is equally general, and fears are entertained that in very many instances the entire crop will be drowned out. Goliad is not yet so much the sufferer, though she has been once or twice almost flooded.

A MAN ARRESTED FOR STARVING HIS WIFE.—A man named Butler has been arrested in Nashville, Tenn., on a charge of attempting to kill his wife by starvation. Suspicions were excited by mysterious proceedings around his house, and an investigation was instituted, which resulted in his incarceration. The poor woman had been kept without food for over a week and died on the 10th inst. It is stated that several humanely disposed ladies had repeatedly tried to obtain admittance to the house during Butler's absence, and were driven away by the daughter of Mrs. Butler, who set a fierce dog upon them. On one occasion, a lady passing by heard a faint cry of "water! water!" The person bore the marks of violence, and about her limbs were black marks of cords, by which it is supposed she was bound to the bed. She was so much reduced that the bones in many places had worn through the skin. The accused alleges she was sick of typhoid fever, and was also very intemperate in her habits, and that he kept people away to prevent them from supplying her with drink.

DIGGING GOLD AND PLANTING SLAVERY.—A company left Montgomery, Ala., on the 29th ult., which was organized in that State, and comprises some forty energetic and highly respectable men, destined for the Gila river, in New Mexico, for the purpose of exploring and mining in that region.

The Montgomery Advertiser says the expedition will be the vicinity of the Boundary Survey party and within the protection of their military escort; so that even if the Apache Indians were disposed to be troublesome, (and it is said they are not at all so,) this military force of the United States would keep them in check, until our company could make the necessary exploration of the mining region, when a further force will be sent out, if necessary, by the stockholders.

The Mobile Herald, in noticing the departure of the company from that place, says:—

"As far as we could learn its object, the expedition was formed for the purpose of proceeding to Gila, in New Mexico, to search for gold; and also to form a colony with the remote object of making a new Slave State, somewhat in the way California was formed."

THE BLACK LAW OF DELAWARE.—The Chester (Pa.) Republican says that Judge Millegan, in a recent charge to the Grand Jury of Newcastle Co., Delaware, called attention to the provisions of the "Free Negro Law," as it is called, lately passed by the Legislature of that State, which provides, in addition to other penalties, that in case any colored man, a non-resident, should come into the State, upon any pretext whatever, except as a sailor, or waterman, he subjects himself to a fine of fifty dollars, and in default of payment, he is to be imprisoned and afterwards sold to any person out of the State, who may desire to purchase and hold him in perpetual bondage. The Judge characterized the law as "harsh and unfeeling in its provisions, and uncalled for by the condition of things existing in the State—not founded in the obligation of morality, it is to be hoped that, as soon as it has fulfilled its mission, not of mercy, but of policy, it will be wiped from the statute book by the first Legislature that assembles." Such is the opinion of a learned Judge of one of the most infamous laws ever enacted by a comparatively free State.

LATER FROM RIO DE JANEIRO.—By the arrival last evening of the bark Black Squall, Capt. Codman, from Rio de Janeiro 2d of April, we learn that the Brazillian Government seem now really serious in their endeavors to suppress the slave trade. Several dealers have been heavily fined, and one of the most prominent has been obliged to leave the country. It is declared that it shall be considered piracy, and that the captain of any vessel engaged in the trade shall be punished with death. If the Government continue as firm as now in the attitude they have assumed, the slave trade will be speedily abolished, and that effectually. The yellow fever was raging among the shipping, and prevailing to some extent on shore. The war, so much and so long talked of between Brazil and the Government of Rosas, is likely to be as heretofore—only one of words, though the Brazillians are fitting out, or pretending to fit out, some men-of-war.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—In Wilmington, Vt., on Saturday night last, the store of Mr. James W. Hurlburt was destroyed by fire together with the Post Office, which was in the building. All the letters, papers and documents belonging to individuals and the Government were consumed. Two lads sleeping in the second story were awakened by the crackling of the flames, and barely escaped with their lives. The building and contents were valued at about $6,000. Mr. Hurlburt was insured for $3,800. On Monday, H. Miller Esq., a wealthy and benevolent citizen of Wilmington, on hearing of the misfortune, presented Mr. Hurlburt with a convenient store and piece of land, to enable him to resume his business.

SUMMARY.

The Bangor Whig says that Mr. Charles Hart, blacksmith, of that town, has lately received a patent for a very ingenious harpoon which he has invented. The head of the instrument is in two parts—the point being separate from the rest of the head, and serving the part of a bullet. In the other part of the head a pistol is constructed in the solid steel, in the mouth of which is fitted the point. A percussion lock is concealed and protected under the barb. The whole instrument resembles an ordinary harpoon, and after it is thrown and the whale begins to draw upon it, the pistol is discharged and he is killed by the explosion.

Not long since a lady in St. Louis was engaged before her mirror in going through her toilet exercises, when the glass suddenly receded from her, as the entire front wall of the building parted company with its neighbors, and with a tremendous crash fell into the street. The lady, in utter astonishment at the suddenness of the motion, was left standing in dishabille, though, singularly enough, entirely uninjured. In consequence of the recent grading of the street, the earth beneath the wall had been partially removed, and its sudden giving way was the cause of the accident.

The Southern Banner, of Athens, Ga., gives the particulars of an attempt to assassinate the editor of that paper, made by a woman called Jane Young. She mistook the publisher, Mr. Reynolds, for the editor, and assaulting him with a pistol, inflicted a dangerous wound upon him. His recovery is considered doubtful. The woman was lodged in jail. The motive she assigned was, "that she was published in the Banner as a man dressed in woman's clothes, going about doing mischief."

An alarm for nothing occurred at Gloucester, England, on the morning of Good Friday. It was observed from the shore that in each of two Greek ships a man was maltreated by the crew and then hung by the neck to the yard-arm. The citizens shouted for the police, and some boarded the ships; when they found that the executions had been performed on effigies of Judas Iscariot—a ceremony usual in the Greek church on Good Friday.

The "Asmonean," a paper published in this city and devoted to the interests of the Israelites, makes an assertion which deserves to be be quoted. It is that "there are at present in the State Prison, at Sing Sing, seven hundred and ninety odd prisoners, of every creed and color, save and except the Jewish; NOT ONE person of Jewish faith or descent is among the number!"

A young man named Charles Coffin, employed in the steam mills of Reed & Co., at Lewiston Falls, Me., was lately caught in the belt and drawn around the shaft. His feet were horribly mangled, both ancle-joints destroyed, the right knee-joint dislocated, and the left arm severed from the body five or six inches from the shoulder. There is slight hope of his recovery.

John Hoard was recently imprisoned near Cincinnati on a charge of being a maker of, or dealer in, counterfeit money. Shortly after his arrest, some fifteen or twenty persons broke the jail in which he was confined, took him home to his mother's, in Covington, Ky., and threatened his life in presence of his mother if he did not leave the country, since when he has not been seen.

The N. Y. Tribune states that extensive depredations have for some time been committed upon the Government lands of Michigan. The amount of lumber carried away unlawfully to Wisconsin and Illinois is estimated at five million feet per week during the season of navigation. The attention of Government having been directed to these robberies, steps have been taken to put a stop to them.

Wm. Edenbo, who was sentenced in Montgomery Co., Md., to imprisonment for five years, and to pay a fine of $500, for enticing away slaves, has been pardoned by Governor Lowe, after being in confinement for twenty months. The Governor granted his pardon on a petition being presented him, numerously signed by the citizens, in which his innocence was declared. Edenbo has left for his home in Pennsylvania.

The British government has a plan to obtain in connection with the census an account of all places of worship in the kingdom, and the number of worshippers present on a given Sunday. The dissenting bodies have entered into the work with zeal. This will supply a want of information which has long been felt. It will show the relative influence of dissent.

By the receipt of St. Paul's (Minnesota) papers of the 13th inst., we learn that the old hatred is again displaying itself between the Sioux and Chippewa tribes of Indians, notwithstanding the treaty of peace made last winter. A party of Chippewas have been barbarously murdered by some of the Sioux, and a large number of the latter armed and painted, have also taken the war-path, and have directed their march against the Chippewas.

The express passenger train on the Erie Railroad from New York, on Thursday morning, when between Forestville and Dayton, was passing over an embankment about ten or fifteen feet high, when the track gave way, after the engine and one passenger car had passed over it. It appears that the heavy rain of the previous night had washed out a culvert, thus weakening the embankment. The other cars were thrown from the track, and several passengers were injured. One man had his arm badly broken, and sustained other injuries; it is feared that he will not survive. A brakeman had his arm broken; and one man, who was standing upon a platform, was thrown twenty five or thirty feet in the air. He, however, received no material injury.

We learn from the Ohio Statesman that on the 10th inst. the bridge on the Louisille & Frankfort R. R., a short distance west of the latter place, gave way as a train was passing over it, and fell with the cars, a distance of twenty feet. There were two passenger cars attached to what is styled the "Boarding train," in which were passengers, engineers, superintendants, and others engaged on the road, all of whom were carried down in the broken mass. Six dead bodies, shockingly mangled, were recovered from the ruins at the last accounts. The loss of life is thought to be very great.

The celebrated Kit Carson and a number of other persons arrived at St. Louis on the 12th inst., from Santa Fe. A party of Mexican traders also arrived on the same day, among them two brothers of ex-Governor Armijo. They report having met many Indians of the Arraphoe, Cheyenne, Cammanche and Pawnee tribes. The latter were rather unfriendly, but evinced no disposition to molest them, the party being too strong to admit of any hope of success in an attack. They also met many Indians of various tribes at the Camerone, who were quite friendly, and evinced a disposition to trade.

The Governor of Maine, in his Message, represents the fiscal concerns of the State as being in a very satisfactory condition. The public debt is $600,500, payable in annual sums up to 1869. The proceeds of the public lands, which are set apart to meet this debt, will furnish ample means for several years to come, if they be not eventually sufficient to extinguish the debt.

The Annual Report of the Trustees of the Maine Insane Hospital at Augusta, shows a flourishing condition of the affairs of that Institution. Up to October, 1850, a period of ten years, there had been 1,060 admissions, embracing all grades and stages of insanity. Of this number, 448 have recovered and been restored to their friends, being 40.70 per cent. of recoveries on the whole number of admissions. Of the 1,060 admissions, 772 were recent cases, of less than a year's duration.

The Columbus (O.) Statesman says that the wheat in the center and southern portion of the State is most seriously injured by the late frosts, especially the early sown. Thousands of acres may be seen red at the top, yellow at the bottom, and wholly suspended in its growth. It has commenced sprouting from the root, and will throw up new heads probably if the weather should be favorable, and make perhaps a half crop, but not of perfect grain. Late sown wheat promises well.

We learn that a lad was killed by a blow from the trunk of one of the elephants, attached to Raymond and Co.'s menagerie, in Derby, during the exhibition there on Wednesday. As is frequently the case, a crowd of boys were feeding the animal with nuts, apples, &c. when the deceased, who was among the number, wantonly punctured the trunk with some sharp instrument, which enraged the elephant.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. EDWARDS, E. A. PARK, and M. STUART, of Andover; Dr. ROBINSON and H. B. SMITH, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has beee received in the short time which has elapsed since the union was made public, and the universal approbation of the measure which the publisher is daily receiving through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

TERMS.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, ... $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the BIBLIOTHECA SACRA, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf with marbled edges, at $25 00.

Miscellaneous.

From an English Paper.

The Philosophy of Sport.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

Bear lightly on their foreheads, Time!
Strew roses on their way;
The young in heart, however old,
That prize the present day,
And, wiser than the pompous proud,
Are wise enough to play.

I love to see a man forget
His blood is growing cold,
And leap, or swim, or gather flowers,
Oblivious of his gold,
And mix with children in their sport,
Nor think that he is old.

I love to see the man of care
Take pleasure in a toy;
I love to see him row or ride,
And tread the grass with joy,
Or hunt the flying cricket-ball,
As lusty as a boy.

All sports that spare the humblest pain,
That neither maim nor kill—
That lead us to the quiet field,
Or to the wholesome hill—
Are duties which the pure of heart
Religiously fulfill.

Though some may laugh that full-grown men
May frolic in the wood,
Like children let adrift from school—
Not mine the scornful mood;
I honor happiness,
And deem it gratitude.

And though, perchance, the cricketer,
Or "Chinaman," that flies
His dragon-kite, with boys and girls,
May seem to some unwise—
I see no folly in their play,
But sense that underlies.

The road of life is hard enough
Bestrewn with slag and thorn;
I would not mock the simplest joy
That make it less forlorn,
But fill its evening path with flowers
As fresh as those of morn.

'T is something, when the noon has passed,
To brave the touch of Time,
And say, "Good friend, thou harm'st me not;
My soul is in its prime;
Thou canst not chill my warmth of heart—
I carol while I climb."

Give us but health and peace of mind,
Whate'er our clime or clan,
We'll take delight in simple things,
Nor deem that sports unman;
And let the proud, who fly no kites,
Despise us if they can!

Natural Second Sight.

The believers in spiritual and mesmeric mysteries had the laugh turned upon them the other night by M. Gandon's explanations of the manner in which the feats of himself and nephew, in what he has called natural second sight, are accomplished. These feats, as is well known, have excited a great deal of attention in New York, and though M. Gandon has never before indicated the secret, it has been supposed that they were performed by means of a perfect mental rapport closely akin to the phenomena of mesmerism, between himself and his nephew.

On Thursday evening some two hundred persons were assembled at the Chinese Rooms to see the mystery unveiled. After about half an hour spent in the usual experiments, the nephew telling, with perfect promptness and exactitude, names, dates, figures, &c., which were written on a slate and shown to the uncle, or communicated to him in a whisper, at a distance from the stage where the nephew was seated blindfold, the uncle proceeded to explain the process employed.

About the process there is apparently nothing mesmeric, or difficult to understand. It consists simply in indicating by the mode of putting the question, the answer to be given. In cases where a third party asks the question, the uncle indicates the answer in some seemingly casual remark made to the questioner or to the company. The indication is by the initial letters of the words used in framing the question or the remark. These initial letters must be such that by taking the letter which in the regular order of the alphabet immediately precedes each, the desired word, or phrase, is at once arrived at. For instance, the word rose is given to the uncle; he says, quel nom? regarde donc! (what name, look now,) or some other phrase, whose words begin with the letters q, n, r, d, and the nephew at once takes the letters which succeed those respectively, and so constructs his reply. When any card, as the ace of hearts for instance, is named to the uncle, the nephew is made to understand what card is wanted by the words "Bien, demandez," which the uncle addresses to the person who has just whispered or written the name of the card, and who then demands aloud, and is answered correctly; the word bien, or well, being understood between uncle and nephew to mean heart, and the letter d, the initial of the word demandez, to signify one.

This process was fully illustrated by M. Gandon through repeated experiments made and explained in detail, after it had been communicated to the audience. The difficulty in using it consists solely in constructing phrases with sufficient rapidity. But after the years of practice devoted to it by M. Gandon the greatest dexterity is conceivable. He certainly pushes it to the borders of the miraculous, and even after it has been clearly explained, the results are as surprising as ever.

M. Gandon stated finally that some such device was used by false magnetizers with their subjects, and by gamblers at cards, and that in order to be sure that a somnambulist is honest, correct answers must be obtained after the magnetizer has left the room; and that in order to avoid being cheated by gamblers at cards they must not be allowed to speak even the most insignificant words during the game. RUSSIAN ANNIVERSARY.—It is stated that the Russian Government has decided that the thousandth anniversary of the Russian Empire shall be celebrated next year with the greatest pomp in all the cities and large towns in Russia. The foundation of that empire was laid by Ruric and his followers from Scandanavia. Previously the whole of that nation was traversed by tribes of barbarians, called by the Romans, Samaritans. Ruric was of Norman stock, and from him and his adherents have descended, in great part, the present nobility of Russia. The serfs are the old Samaritans, though the intermingling of the two races, on the same soil, and breathing the same air, has effaced, we suppose, all traces of their different origins. The names of Russ and Russians, were derived from the Normans.

It is most remarkable that both the English and Russian nobility, boast of the same origin—the Norman, it is well known, having settled in France, and afterwards, under William the Conqueror, having taken possession of England. These two races, the English and the Russian, with their copious effusion of Norman blood, are now doubtless exercising the greatest and most widely extended influence upon the world. The English language is spoken by about 55,000,000 of people, the Russian by about 47,000,000.

Electro-Magnetic Locomotive.

Prof. Page has communicated to the National Intelligencer an interesting statement of his experiment with an Electro-Magnetic Locomotive on the railroad between Washington and Bladensburg. He says:—

The locomotive, with the battery fully charged, weighs 16½ tons. With the seven passengers taken on the trip to and from Bladensburg, the weight was 17 tons. Under the most favorable arrangements, eight pounds are required to start a ton on a perfectly level rail, and seven pounds will barely keep a ton in motion. Ordinarily, upon railroads, the allowance is ten pounds to a ton, but this applies only to cars unincumbered by machinery. The friction of locomotive machinery renders its draught far greater, and can only be accurately ascertained by experiment in each case.

The magnetic locomotive, the first of its kind ever made, is imperfect, and, from the newness and stiffness of all the work, it runs exceedingly hard. We will take 200 pounds, which is below the actual power required to keep it in motion on a level portion of the road. A horse power upon the usual estimate is 150 pounds 2½ miles an hour, or 375 pounds 1 mile an hour. The speed of the magnetic locomotive is, we will say, 15 miles an hour on a level road (it has in fact made more) and its traction 200 pounds. We have, then, 375 pounds 1 mile an hour for one horse, and 200 pounds 15 miles an hour for the locomotive, which gives eight horse power. But the engine has more than this. It has greater power at a slow speed, and must have, by all reasonable estimates, twelve horse power; which, as I said before, is about one half of its proper capacity. One of the most serious defects arises from a want of insulation in the helices.

After this engine was placed on the road it was found necessary to throw out of action five of the helices, and these at the most important point in the stroke. This difficulty could not be remedied without taking both engines entirely out—an undertaking for which I had neither the time nor means, as the track with which we are now accommodated is soon to be filled up for the purposes of the Railroad Company. Another serious difficulty encountered, was the breaking of the porous cells in the battery, causing a mixture of the two acids, and the interception of a large portion of the power. I had great difficulty in procuring suitable porous cells, and the manufacture of such as I needed was, after great expense, given up by two of the best pottery establishments in the country as a thing impracticable.

It was, however, accomplished through the ingenuity of Mr. Ari Davis, my engineer, but they were made of a weak clay, and have now, from frequent use, become so much impaired as to break from the slightest causes. Before we started two of them broke, and the defect was only partially repaired. Not far from Bladensburg two more gave way, and detracted at once greatly from our working power. On our return, about two miles from Bladensburg, three more gave way, and we were reduced to at least one half of our power. The running time from Washington to Bladensburg was thirty-nine minutes. We were stopped on the way five times, or we should have probably made the run in less than thirty minutes. Going and coming there were seven stops and three delays—that is, the engine was backed three times, but without entirely losing headway. It is a very important and interesting feature of this engine, which I demonstrated some years since, that the reversing power is greater than the propelling power; it is nearly twice as great. When the engine is reversed, the magnetic electric induction is in favor of the battery current, and augments its effects. The defect of the cells is easily remedied. The trouble growing out of the oscillating motion of the car can all be obviated by using rotary instead of reciprocating engines. The greatest speed attained on our last trip was about nineteen miles an hour, and about seven more than in any former experiment.

Cultivation of Cranberries.

Edward Thatcher, of Yarmouth, Mass., furnishes the officers of the Barnstable Co., Agricultural Society an account of his mode of cultivating cranberries. The following is his statement:—

July 12th, 1845, I purchased for $40, then considered more than it was worth, one and a half acres of land—about one half a sandy beach, and the remainder a low peat meadow covered with water. A rim of about six feet in width around the bog, and between the water and the beach, had a few cranberry vines on it, which had been closely fed off.

In the spring of 1846, I drained the bog and covered about one eighth of an acre with sand three inches thick, and set it with cranberry vines in rows two feet apart, and hoed them four times in the season of 1846, and once in the spring of 1847. The grass then got advantage of me, and I left the vines to work their own way. They have now nearly overcome and worked out the grass and rushes. On the remainder of the bog I strewed vines, and trod them in the mud, by walking over them. These grew with rapidity without any further care except flowing in the winter. In the fall of 1848 I gathered from ten rods where no sand had been spread, as many bushels of cranberries, while on the part sanded I had scarcely as many quarts. The latter are now doing better, having got the advantage of the grass, and I think will finally work it out. I have this year, on the quarter of an acre offered for premium, quite a good crop, although the worms destroyed nearly one half. I have picked one square rod of the light-colored variety, set in the mud, and it yielded two bushels and twelve quarts (or at the rate of 380 bushels to the acre.) One square rod of the small dark-colored variety on the mud yielded one bushel and two quarts. The large red variety yielded on the mud two bushels to the square rod. The whole quarter is not yet gathered; it will yield about thirty-five bushels, about one half of the vines being set on mud, and one half on sand.

In selecting soil for cranberries, it is highly necessary to select such as will not dry in summer, but much also depends on the selection of the vines, as the Committee will see by the samples here presented, all having the same soil and the same treatment. The samples are not selected, but sent in precisely as they grew. The whole expense, on the above bog, up to the present time, does not exceed $40.

I have received from the sale of cranberries, up to the fall of 1849,		$320
Deduct for picking, one fourth,	$80
All other expenses for setting, interest, &c.,	$40
		—— $120
Net profit,		$200

"What are Birds good for?"

The American Agriculturist, in answer to this inquiry, relates the following anecdote:

"In connection with this subject, we give an anecdote related to us last winter by Gov. Aiken, of South Carolina, of the rice birds. These little creatures gather around the rice in harvest time, in countless myriads, and of course consume considerable grain. Some years ago, it was determined to make war upon them, and drive them out of the country; and the measure was in some degree successful, so far as getting rid of the birds. 'What are birds for?' the rice planter soon found out; for with the decrease of the birds, the worms increased so rapidly, that, instead of a few scattering grains to feed the birds, the whole crop was demanded to fill the insatiable maw of the army that came to consume every young shoot as fast as it sprung from the ground. Most undoubtedly the birds were invited back again with a hearty welcome. Rice cannot be cultivated without their assistance.

A few years ago, the black-birds in the northern part of the State of Indiana were considered a grievous nuisance to the farmer. Whole fields of oats were sometimes destroyed, and the depredations upon the late corn were greater than can be believed, if told. The farmer sowed and the birds reaped. He scolded and they twittered. Occasionally a charge of shot brought down a score, but made no more impression upon the great sea of birds than the removal of a single bucket of water from the great salt-puddle. A few years later, every green thing on the land seemed destined to destruction by the army worm. Man was powerless—a worm among worms. But his best friends, the hated black-birds, came to his relief just in time to save when all seemed lost. No human aid could have helped him. How thankful should man be that God has given him for his companions and fellow-laborers, in the cultivation of the earth, these lovely birds! 'The laborer is worthy of his hire.' Why should we grudge the little moiety claimed by the busy little fellows which followed the plough, and snatched away the worm from the seed that it might produce grain for his and our subsistence? No honest man would cheat a bird out of its summer's work."

Sketch of German Life.

William Howitt gives the following graphic sketch of Life in Germany, which will, perhaps, both amuse and inform our readers:

Each German has his house, his orchard, his roadside trees so laden with fruit, that if he did not carefully prop up, and tie together, and in many places hold the boughs together with wooden clamps, they would be torn asunder by their own weight. He has his corn plot, his plot for mangel-wurtzel or hay, for potatoes, for hemp, &c. He is his own master, and he therefore, and every branch of his family, have the strongest motives for constant exertion. You see the effect of this in his industry and economy.

In Germany nothing is lost. The produce of the trees and cows is carried to market. Much fruit is dried for winter use. You see wooden trays of plums, cherries, and sliced apples, lying in the sun to dry. You see strings of them hanging from their chamber windows in the sun. The cows are kept up for the greater part of the year, and every green thing is collected for them. Every little nook where the grass grows by the roadside, and river, and brook, is carefully cut by the sickle, and carried home, on the heads of women and children, in baskets, or tied in large cloths. Nothing of any kind that can be made any use of is lost. Weeds, nettles, nay the very goose-grass which covers waste places, is cut up and taken for the cows. You see the children standing in the streets of villages, in the streams which generally run down them, busy washing these weeds, before they are given to the cattle. They carefully collect the leaves of the marsh grass, carefully cut their potato tops for them, and even, if other things fail, gather green leaves from the woodlands. One cannot help thinking continually of the enormous waste of such things in England—of the vast quantities of grass on banks, by roadsides, in the openings of plantations, in lanes, in church-yards, where grass from year to year springs and dies, but which, if properly cut would maintain many thousand cows for the poor.

To pursue still further this subject of German economy. The very cuttings of the vines are dried and preserved for winter fodder. The tops and refuse of the hemp serve as bedding for the cows;—nay, even the rough stalks of the poppies, after the heads have been gathered for oil, are saved, and all these are converted into manure for the land. When these are not sufficient, the children are sent into the woods to gather moss, and all our readers familiar with Germany will remember to have seen them coming homeward with large bundles on their heads. In autumn, the falling leaves are gathered and stacked for the same purpose. The fir-cones, which with us lie and rot in the woods, are carefully collected, and sold for lighting fires.

In short, the economy and care of the German peasant are an example to all Europe. He has for years—nay, ages—been doing that, as it regards agricultural management, to which the British public is but just now beginning to open its eyes. Time, also, is as carefully economised as everything else. They are early risers, as may well be conceived, when the children, many of whom come from considerable distances, are in school at six in the morning. As they tend their cattle or swine, the knitting never ceases, and hence the quantities of stockings, and other household things, which they accumulate, are astonishing.

The Guild of Literature and Art.

Under this name it is proposed to erect and endow an institution, in connection with a life insurance Company for the sole advantage of Professors of Literature and Art. The idea, which originated with Mr. Charles Dickens, began to assume a shape under the roof of Sir E. Lytton Bulwer, in the Autumn of last year, when Mr. Dickens and his company of amateur players were visited at Knebworth Hall, and entertaining Sir Edward's guests with their dramatic representations. The subject being then mooted, Sir Edward was so much struck with it, that he undertook not only to make a free gift of such land as should be requisite for the erection of the proposed residences or lodges, but also to write a play (if Mr. Dickens and his company would undertake to perform it with other plays, in a series of representations,) the whole profits of which should be devoted to the ends of the institution. The bargain was struck upon the spot; the play, a comedy in five acts, was promptly written; has since been rehearsed and prepared; and is now upon the eve of representation at Devonshire House. The society or guild will embrace several objects, such as life insurances, at rates of premium calculated as payable either for the whole term of life, or as altogether ceasing to be payable at a certain age; annuities to commence at a certain age; pensions to widows; payments destined to the education or provision of children, &c. It is proposed to establish and endow an institute, having at its disposal certain salaries, to which certain duties will be attached; together with a limited number of free residences, which, though sufficiently small to be adapted to a very moderate income, will be completed with due regard to the ordinary habits and necessary comforts of gentlemen. The offices of endowment will consist—1. Of a warden, with a house and salary of £200 a year. 2. Of members, with a house and £170, or, without a house, £200 a year. 3. Of associates, with a salary of £100 a year. The details of the scheme are set forth in the prospectus; they appear to be practical in their character, and to be wisely and happily adapted to the end in view—that end being to afford aid to struggling artists or authors in such a way as shall necessitate no degrading plea of poverty—no painful exposition of calamity and want—but as shall bear the character of a tribute to merit, not to an alms of destitution.

The Pine and Cedar Forests of California.

Of all the wonders I have ever seen in the vegetable kingdom, nothing will bear comparison with the magnificent and lofty growth of cedars and pines which embellish the hills and mountains that lead to, and make up the great Sierra Nevada range. The magnificence and grandeur of scenes in which these trees abound, cannot be imagined by any man who has not seen them, and felt the awe and sublimity to which they give rise. I have counted in a circle of 50 feet in diameter, 13 pine trees, not one of which was less than three feet in diameter, nor less than 250 feet in height, nor was any of them marked by the slightest curve or inclination. They are inimitable and lofty monuments of nature, uninfluenced by sweeping storms and winds, unbent and undecayed by a centurian age. Not a limb nor a knot can be found upon their bodies until you reach an altitude of from 100 to 200 feet, beyond which height they continue to grow until their towering majesty overawes all surrounding objects, and affords a fit refuge for the noble bird which adorns the banner of the country. No man can travel through these scenes without feeling that the grandeur of Omnipotence itself is teaching him his finite and insignificant powers.

TO ACCELERATE THE GERMINATION OF SEEDS.—When a gardener has some choice and scare seeds, or when he is endeavoring to raise a particularly early crop, he takes more than ordinary care with them. He selects some good soil, sows his seeds, waters them enough, but not too much, and takes the greatest care to fit all the conditions to the nature and requirements of the young plants. If he is anxious to hurry on the germination of the seeds, so as to bring the young plants forward as rapidly as possible, he gives them a little bottom heat, sowing the seeds in fine mold resting on half-rotten dung, because, under these circumstances, the gentle heat of the still fermenting manure, and the vapors which it gives out, are highly favorable to the germination of the seeds. This is one of the best known modes of raising young plants; for notwithstanding all that has been said about seed steeping and other wonderful modes of accelerating the growth of plants, we have, at the present time, no more powerfnl mode of aiding germination, and forcing the growth of plants.

TOBACCO DUST A PROTECTION AGAINST INSECTS.—We last year procured, from a snuff mill, a barrel of dry but damaged snuff flour, and prepared drudging boxes, covered with a fine bolting cloth, with which we sifted it over the surfaces of any plants attacked by insects, and with most signal success. The snuff should be applied, if practicable, while the plant is wet with dew, and repeated after every shower. If the boxes are properly made, (like common flour drudge,) and the snuff is perfectly fine and dry, but little time is necessary to go over an acre of plants Even the rose bug, cabbage louse, thrips on grape vines, &c. all yield to the influence of snuff, and the most delicate plant of the hot-house is not injured by its application. For field vegetables, caustic lime, made into a fine powder, while dry, and applied before slacking, by contact with the air, will produce similar results. [Prof. Mapes.

NEW PRINTING MACHINE.—A letter to the Commercial Advertiser, from Paris says that a gentleman of that city, named Engene Roujet, a son of one of the Representatives, has invented a new printing machine, and had just taken out a patent for it, which appears to be an improvement calculated to compete with the last "Fast Press" of our own countryman, Mr. Hoe. It is asserted that its chief advantages consist in the rapidity and cheapness with which it strikes off the impressions. At present, the price for presswork alone is ten francs a thousand, but this apparatus reduces the price to five, just one half. The common presses in use in that city, can make but about twelve thousand impressions in six hours; whereas, Mr. Roujet's press will strike off twenty-five thousand per hour. The forms in this invention are made up cylindrically.

Variety.

A lady of Pineville, Bucks county, Pa., named Lettie A. Smith, has recently invented, and taken measures to secure by patent a machine for working butter. It consists of a stationary frame, with an adjusting one secured to it, in which is hung the butter pan; which has a draining spout at one corner, running down underneath to carry off the pressed out buttermilk. The pan can be set in a moment to any inclination, to allow the operator to work the butter as may be desired and to drain off the milk, &c.

The new Constitution of Maryland is published. Among the prominent features are, that persons engaged in duels, as principals or seconds, shall be disqualified from holding office. Clergymen are illegible for seats in the Legislature; bribery disqualifies for holding office; persons convicted of larceny or infamous crime are disfranchised; a certain amount of property is exempted from seizure for debt. The Governor's term is to be 4 years, at a salary of $3,600 per annum.

The French priests know how to draw gay Parisians to church. We find it announced in the Paris papers, that "At the Madeline, to-morrow, a charity sermon will be preached by the Father Ventura, for the foundation in the Parish of a charitable institution called 'Petites Sœurs des Pauvres,' for the reception of aged persons of both sexes. Mme. Sontag, Mlle. Lemil, and M. Alexis Dupont will sing on the occasion."

More than twelve different patents, to as many different persons, have been granted in the United States and England, within the last ten years, for what is known as "Vulcanized Rubber," "Metallic Rubber," "Kianized Rubber," "Insoluble Rubber," "Thionized Rubber," &c. One distinguishing quality of all of them is, that changes of the atmosphere do not appreciably affect them. Each of these patents is a process independent of and different from the other.

A "notion seller" was offering Yankee clocks, finely varnished and gaudily colored, and with a looking glass front, to some one not remarkable for personal charms. "Why, it's beautiful," said the vender. "Beautiful, indeed! a look at it almost frightens me!" "Then, mister," replied Jonathan, "guess you'd better buy one that han't got no looking glass."

The number of distinct species of insects already known and described, cannot be estimated at less than 100,000. It is worthy of remark, as an evidence of the observing spirit of our age, that of this number of insects, four-fifths have been discovered within the last century; for, in 1743, Ray estimated the whole number of species at 20,000 only.

The Board of Managers of the "National Monument" suggest to their fellow citizens throughout the Union, that collections be made on the approaching Anniversary of the National Independence in aid of this patriotic work, wherever the day is celebrated.

We find the following in the Boston Traveler: "A New York house has recently transmitted an order to Paris for an invoice of dress goods, with a deep border on the side. These goods are intended for ladies' short dresses, and the width of the cloth will comprise the length of the skirt."

'Job printing!' exclaimed an old woman, the other day, as she peeped over her spectacles at the advertising page of a country paper. 'Poor Job! they've kept him printing, week after week, ever since I first larnt to read; and if he wasn't the most patientest man that ever was, he never could have stood it so long no how!'

We are not to suppose that the oak wants stability because its light and changeable leaves dance to the music of the breezes; nor are we to conclude that a man wants solidity and strength of mind because he may exhibit an occasional playfulness and levity.

A Rhode Island lad, under examination by a Connecticut schoolmaster, being asked: 'How many gods are there?' The boy, after scratching his head some time, replied—'I don't know how many you've got in Connecticut; but we have none in Rhode Island!'

Jewelry is becoming quite fashionable again. One of our cotemporaries says he met a lady on New Years day who had a farm on each wrist, a four story house around her neck, and at least six life memberships to the Bible society attached to each ear.

A taste for literature secures cheerful occupation for the unemployed and languid hours of life; and how many persons, in these hours, for want of innocent resources are now impelled to coarse and brutal pleasure.

A divine in Kent, seldom in church, but a rigid Justice of Peace, having a vagrant brought before him, said surlily—'I'll teach you the law, you vagabond, I'll warrant you.' 'It would be much more becoming,' answered the poor fellow, 'if you would teach me the gospel.'

'Let go that jib!—let go that jib, QUICK,' shouted the captain of a down east sloop to a raw hand, in a squall. 'I aint a touchin' yer jib!' returned Jonathan, indignantly, as he thrust his hands elbow deep in his pockets.

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

Reply to "J. N. B"—Part 3.

"The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us—even us who are all of us here alive this day."—DEUT. v. 2, 3.

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah."—JEREM. xxxi. 31.

"In that he saith, a new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to vanish away."—HEB. viii. 13.

3. The Exemplary Violation of the Sabbath.

I most fully concur with my friend in the gravity of the "third proposition." Most thoroughly do I recognize the truth, that its statement, "if not sustained, demands profound regret and public retraction!" Let him rest assured, he shall have it! The proposition, (as correctly announced by J. N. B.,) "is built upon the construction of the word 'work' in the fourth commandment." But when he attempts to modify the legal restriction by the word "unnecessary," I promptly check him. This "is to adopt a Pharsaic construction." Our civil judges, "learned in the law," have not yet agreed upon the exact meaning of this term. No such standard of interpretation as may be adjusted by the uncertain and ever-varying judgment of individual expediency, is admissable here. "We have a more sure word of prophecy;" and to the letter and the spirit of the Mosiac law, shall I strictly confine my friend.

Of all means of determining the "intent of the lawgiver," and consequently the application of the law, cotemporary exposition has ever been justly held the most decisive. When, therefore, we discover the import of the prohibition, "in it thou shalt not do ANY work," by adjudged cases or illustrative exhortations, (as in Exod. xvi. 23; xxxv. 3; xvi. 29; Numb. xv. 32; Amos viii. 5; Isai. lviii. 13; Jerem. xvii. 21, 22; Neh. x. 31; xiii. 19;) then have we—so far as these cases apply—an authoritative and final decision as to the reqirements of the fourth commandment. No sophistry can evade it.

I have shown, by a comparison of John v. 8, with Jer. xvii. 21, that Jesus ostentatiously violated the fourth commandment. The fact stands unshaken and inevitable. The only evasion attempted by J. N. B. is that "the poor man's bed was evidently nothing but (krabbaton) a small portable couch or mattrass, such as travelers carried about with them." When my friend discovers the "chapter and verse" by which "krabbatoi" are excepted from the command, "Thus saith the Lord, Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the Sabbath-day," his suggestion will deserve a reply.

So studiously did Jesus endeavor to wean the Jewish veneration for the Sabbath, so studiously did he seek occasion practically to deny its sanctity, that, it would appear, most of his miraculous cures were performed on that day; insomuch that the synagogue ruler "said unto the people, there are six days in which men ought to 'work;' in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the Sabbath-day." (Luke xiii. 14.) Publicly and studiously did Jesus call attention to the fact of his doing work on that day; he did not "speak the word," but he "made clay," he "annointed the eyes," he ordered "washing," for the blind. By word, and by deed, he solemnly proclaimed, "I WORK!" His very claim of being "Lord of the Sabbath," fully establishes the fact of its violation. How could he exercise "lordship" over the institution, except by resisting its control? If his authority were his vindication, it certainly could not have been a vindication of his obedience to the law!

The "surprise" formerly expressed at this "charge" of violation, has been modified by my friend, to the exclusion of those "Pharisaic Jews,"—"who had murder in their hearts." He will have to modify it still further. "That disciple whom Jesus loved" has expressly asserted that his Master "broke the Sabbath!" "But Jesus answered them, 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work!' Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God." (John v. 17, 18.) "A Pharisaic construction" will not here avail my friend. His last refuge is taken away. It was not the false accusation of "making himself equal with God;" it was not the false accusation of having "broken the Sabbath;" it was the avowed and unquestioned TRUTH in both cases, that stirred up "murder in the hearts" of these Sabbath-keeping Pharisees. I trust that this solemn declaration will be received as a satisfactory answer to the former query, "Can any man, in his sober senses, believe such a proposition?" A far more startling question presents itself—Where would J. N. B. have been found on that day, with his present views of Sabbath obligation? Holding that this law "was certainly binding on the Jews, of whom our Lord was one according to the flesh," and that "every Jew, including Jesus himself, was then bound by it!" I see not how he could possibly escape the conclusion, "This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath-day!" (John ix. 16.) In vain would the "Son of man" claim to be "Lord of the Sabbath." By my friend's account, he could only be Lord of the construction! If so, how subversive that construction! I still expect, however, from the candor of my friend, an admission that the proposition under proof is not "calumnious," and that it is not "false!"

J. N. B. "acquits" Paley of having endorsed this "third proposition." Considering that this writer does not even advert to the subject, this acquittal is very liberal and very—just! If, however, my friend attaches any importance to the endorsement of so irrefragable a fact, by a "professedly Christian writer," I am happy to present him with that of "one of the first scholars and soundest thinkers in Great Britain"—Archbishop Whately: "It will be plainly seen, on a careful examination of the accounts given by the evangelists, that Jesus did decidedly and avowedly violate the Sabbath; on purpose, as it should seem, to assert in this way his divine authority." (Essays No. 5, note A, On the Sabbath.)

4th. The Silence of the New Testament Scriptures.

The solitary passage previously quoted by my friend, (1 Tim. i. 9—11,) to impeach the "fourth proposition" is still retained. At his request I have given the chapter a careful and repeated examination, and with the assistance of the best expositors within my reach Still I can see nothing in the passage of what appears to J. N. B. so obvious a reference to the Decalogue; nor anything to warrant his conclusions, "1. That the Decalogue is recognized as the moral standard;" and, "2. That Sabbbath-breakers are certainly included among 'the ungodly and profane.'" It is perhaps a singular fact, but the more directly opposite have been my convictions, on both these points. Still, as I have no wish to deprive my friend of its just force, I submit it to the candid and intelligent, without argument. I doubt not, he has in this quotation, done the best possible; but I see no reason for modifying my first reception of it.

5th. The formal Abrogation of the Sabbath at Jerusalem.

The original objection to my "fifth" conclusion, was that the controversy before the Jerusalem council was "restricted to the Jewish ceremonial law," falls necessarily within the admitted consideration of the Apostolic convention, and consequently (as before remarked) within the class of observances rejected as unnecessary for the Gentile Christian.

To meet, however, the entire question involved, and to place the investigation on its broadest grounds, I showed, by the very proceedings of the council, that the great subject presented for adjudication "was evidently the whole 'law of Moses,' and the extent of the obligation." My friend, after assenting to this by the emphatic "precisely so," seems desirous of excepting "the Decalogue!" To which I simply reply, that the Mosaic law is never once alluded to in the New Testament, as excluding the Decalogue.* The texts he has cited, (Acts xxi. 20—25; Heb. x. 28,) are most certainly not exceptions to this statement.

In the present instance, it may be observed that the practical controversy being admitted by J. N. B. to "include what was distinctive of Judaism," the Decalogue, as a code, was actually as "distinctive" as any other portion of the Jewish law. "Throughout all history we discover no trace of 'the Decalogue, among the nations of antiquity.'" Nay, two of its provisions (the second and fourth commandments) were unknown to the moral law of the Romans. Of these two "distinctive" precepts, the former was as expressly enjoined upon the Gentile church by the Council, while the latter was expressly rejected by its decisive silence. Two other prohibitions of the Mosaic law, (Exod. xxii. 16 and Levit. xvii. 12, were conjoined with this one selected from the Decalogue. The "seventh commandment," I do not conceive to have been involved in this re-enactment, any more than the sixth commandment or the eighth. Of these three requirements, gleaned from the "whole 'law of Moses,'" two are, in modern ethics, "moral" precepts, the other a "positive" one. I am "compelled to admit," says J. N. B., that "the obvious reason why these two points of the moral law were at all referred to, was, that they were the only ones likely to be transgressed by those just emancipated from the Roman Paganism,'—"not perceiving that it ruins my argument." I confess that this is strictly true. The "admission" is the very bulwark of my argument. It was precisely because these "two points" were not enjoined by the Pagan moral law, that their special enactment was necessary. Though not probably individually controverted before the Jerusalem council, they were as really an integral "part of the law in dispute," (that is, as really "distinctive of Judaism" for the persons addressed,) as circumcision itself! My friend, as a classical scholar, must be fully aware of this.

What then is the relation of the fourth commandment to the Gentile Christian! The perspicuous answer is contained in two irrefutable propositions. 1st. The "Sabbath" most certainly was not obligatory by any Gentile law, (my friend's "mistake in fact" notwithstanding,) and 2dly, The "Sabbath" as certainly was not made obligatory by the Jerusalem edict. The Roman converts, after learning that but three things of "the law of Moses" had been enjoined upon them as "necessary things," would at once have rejected as an absurdity, any imposition of the Mosaic Sabbath upon their consciences. As well might the obligation of Circumcision have been asserted. A Persius, a Martial, or a Juvenal, would have asked in astonishment, "How could the Council possibly omit an observance that we regard so peculiarly 'distinctive of Judaism,' and that was therefore one of the most prominent of those in controversy, if it was intended still to be a "necessary thing?'" My friend would find it difficult to give a satisfactory reply. He has not yet "done with the fifth proposition." He must either frankly admit its truth, or, as the only alternative, he must point out the "chapter and verse" which re-enacts the fourth commandment for Gentiles! One of these courses I have a right to demand from a candid disputant.

J. N. B. has attempted a kind of diversion, by citing a few Patristic writers, (including the apocryphal "Barnabas,") to prove that Sunday was commemorated by the early Christians.* A single word is sufficient reply—wholly irrevelant! This point has never been disputed. The question under discussion has no reference whatever to a worship-day;"—it is the Scripture authority for a "Sabbath-day," a day divinely appointed, in which "thou shalt not do any work!" Why then has my friend ventured upon this false issue? When, however, reverting from this, he complacently sums up "The only thing 'burdensome' would be to quote all their various expressions of devout recognition of the Christian Sabbath" he is chargeable with coloring his evidence. Not one of his witnesses says a word in "recognition of the Sabbath;" and almost all of them do testify clearly and strongly against the obligation of the Sabbath! Let him assume the slight "burden" of quoting one of the early "Fathers," recognizing the obligation of the fourth commandment, or expressly designating Sunday "the Sabbath," and he will have contributed something in support of his assumption.

The true "Scriptural view is confirmed in he clearest manner by Ecclesiastical History." The leading Fathers all speak of the fourth commandment as abrogated. As the Bishop of Lincoln remarks (Account of Justin Martyr pp. 96, 97) "the admission of Gentiles into the Church was quickly followed by the controversy respecting the necessity of observing the Mosaic ritual. . . One consequence of which was that the converts, whether Jew or Gentile, who believed that the injunctions of the ceremonial law were no longer obligatory, soon ceased to observe the Sabbath."

Eusebius affirms the early Christian practice, most decisively. He says that as the patriarchs "did not regard circumcision, nor observe the Sabbath, neither do we. . . Such things as these do not belong to Christians." (Hist. Eccles. lib. i cap. 4.)

The Church historian Socrates Scholasticus, in treating of this Jerusalem Council, observes: "Notwithstanding, there are some who, disregarding this, . . . contend about holy days, as if it were for their lives; they invert the commands of God, and make laws for themselves, not valuing the decree of the Apostles: nor do they consider that they practice the contrary to those things which 'seemed good' to God." (Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. 22.)

Our most eminent Reformers—Luther, Melancthon, Cranmer, Tyndale, Calvin, &c. all agree that the fourth commandment is not obligatory upon Christians. In the celebrated "Augsburg Confession of Faith," drawn up by Luther, Melancthon, and other distinguished reformers, it ts explicitly held: "The Scripture has abrogated the Sabbath, teaching that all Mosaic ceremonies may be omitted since the gospel has been preached,' Calvin, in his Institutes, equally explicitly announces that the fourth commandment "was abolished with the rest of the figures at the advent of Christ." It would, indeed, be "burdensome to quote all their various expressions of devout rejection of the Sabbath." It is clear, (as strong-minded Bunyan maintains in his Essay on the Sabbath.) that "when the service or shadow and ceremonies of the seventh-day Sabbath fell, the seventh-day Sabbath fell likewise."†

I regret that I am not allowed to finish my examination of this deeply interesting subject; though I must return you my sincere and thankful acknowledgments, Messrs. Editors, for the very liberal allowance of space you have already accorded me.

To the kindly wishes expressed by J. N. B. I most cordially respond.

Very respectfully, EXODUS.

*The application of Bishop Middleton's learned canons of criticisms respecting the Greek article, settles this question decisively.

*"The first Christians assembled for the purpcses of divine worship, in private houses, in caves and in vaults. Their meetings were on the first day of the week; and in some places they assembled also upon the seventh, which was celebrated by the Jews. Many also observed the fourth day of the week, on which Christ was betrayed; and the sixth, which was the day of his crucifixion. The hour of the day appointed for holding these religious assemblies, varied according to different times and circumstances of the church; but it was generally in the evening after sunset, or in the morning before the day." [Mosheim's CHURCH HISTORY; cent. ii. part ii. chap. iv. sec. 8.

†J. N. B. is evidently reluctant to part company with the illustrious author of "The Pilgrim's Progress," and says with admirable gravity, "he really is on my ground, as any one may see who reads him with proper attention." Since Bunyan founds his able argument for a Christian worship-day on the unconditional abolition of the fourth commandment, if "he really is on my friend's ground," I tender J. N. B. my most hearty congralulation on his adoption of the true 'Scriptural view.' I expect him accordingly to endorse the following: "As for the seventh-day Sabbath, that, as we see, is gone to its grave with the signs and shadows of the Old Testament. . . The first day of the week is the Christian's market-day; that which they so solemnly trade in for soul provision for all the week following. This is the day that they gather manna in. To be sure the seventh-day Sabbath is not that, for of old the people of God could never find manna on that day. . . I conclude that those Gentile Professors that adhere thereto, are Jewified, legalized, and so far gone back from the authority of God, who from such bondages has set his churches free."—(ESSAY ON THE SABBATH; ques. v.)

IMPORTANT DIRCOVERY IN AFRICA.

A Hungarian savant, M. Gaysa, who is now traveling in the interior of Western Africa, has sent a communication to the Imperial Society of Vienna, containing information of great interest. He has found among the Kommenis, a small tribe tributary to the kingdom of Ouhi, in Senegambia, traces of Jacques Compagnon, a French traveler, charged by M. de Choiseni towards the middle of the last century, with a voyage of exploration into the interior of Africa, who disappeared in 1760, and was not afterwards heard from.

Wishing to complete the discoveries which had been made by his brother some years before, Jacques Compagnon left Senegal towards the end of the year 1758, and after visiting all the tribes to the northward and eastward of Senegambia, he penetrated as far as the desert of Simboni, a very curious point for geographical science. Nothing was heard of him after March, 1760, and all the researches of the Governor of the French port of St. Louis proved utterly fruitless.

The Kommenis are a partially civilized people. They have notions of religion which resemble Christianity, and are not entirely ignorant of the arts and sciences. They have a language, an alphabet, and the art of writing. M. Gaysa has discovered in one of their principal villages a small stone monument of a conic shape, covered with numerous inscriptions in letters resembling hieroglyphic characters.

After having studied this curious construction, and after interrogating the oldest inhabitants of the country, and learning the popular tradition, he became convinced that this monument is erected over the grave of Jacques Compagnon, who being made captive by the Kommenis, instructed them in the principles of all the useful arts, and died about the year 1775, leaving among them the venerated reputation of a sage and a good genius. But the conviction of M. Gaysa was turned into certainty when the chief of the tribe showed him various articles of European manufacture, which have been handed down from father to son, and which they are unwilling to part with at any price. Among these he saw a quadrant, on which was engraved the name of Jacques Compagnon.

M. Gaysa, who is a great traveler, designs to continue his explorations in Africa for many years. [Com. Adv.

RETURNING GOOD FOR EVIL.

Obediah Lawson and Watt Dood were neighbors; that is, they lived within a half mile of each other, and no person lived between their respective farms, which would have joined, had not a little strip of prairie land extended itself sufficiently to keep them separated. Dood was the oldest settler, and from his youth up had entertained a singular hatred against Quakers; therefore, when he was informed that Lawson, a regular disciple of that class of people, had purchased the next farm to his, he declared he would make him glad to move away again. Accordingly, a system of petty annoyances was commenced by him, and every time one of Lawson's hogs chanced to stray upon Dood's place, he was beset by men and dogs, and most savagely abused. Things progressed thus for nearly a year, and the Quaker, a man of decidedly peace principles, appeared in no way to resent the injuries received at the hands of his spiteful neighbor. But matters were drawing to a crisis; for Dood more enraged than ever at the quietness of Obediah, made oath that he would do something before long to wake up the spunk of Lawson. Chance favored his design. The Quaker had a high blooded filly, which he had been very careful in raising, and which was just four years old. Lawson took great pride in this animal, and had refused a large sum of money for her.

One evening, a little after sundown, as Watt Dood was passing around his cornfield, he discovered the filly feeding in the little strip of prairie land that separated the two farms, and he conceived the hellish design of throwing off two or three rails of his fence, that the horse might get into his corn during the night. He did so, and the next morning, bright and early, he shouldered his rifle, and left the house. Not long after his absence. a hired man, whom he had recently employed, heard the echo of his gun, and in a few minutes Dood, considerably excited and out of breath came hurrying to the house, where he stated that he had shot at and wounded a buck; that the deer attacked him, and he hardly escaped with his life.

This story was credited by all except the newly employed hand, who had taken a dislike to Watt, and, from his manner, suspicioned that something was wrong. He therefore slipped quietly from the house, and going through the field in the direction of the shot, he suddenly came upon Lawson's filly, stretchde upon the earth, with a bullet-hole through the head, from which the warm blood was still oozing. The animal was warm, and could not have been killed an hour. He hastened back to the dwelling of Dood, who met him in the yard, and demanded somewhat roughly, where he had been.

"I've been to see if your bullet made sure work of Mr. Lawson's filly," was the instant retort.

Watt paled for a moment, but collecting himself, he fiercely shouted,

"Do you dare to say I killed her?"

"How do you know she is dead?" replied the man.

Dood bit his lip, hesitated for a moment, and then turning walked into the house.

A couple of days passed by, and the morning of the third one had broken, as the hired man met friend Lawson riding in search of his filly.

A few words of explanation ensued, when with a heavy heart, the Quaker turned his horse and rode home, where he informed the people of the fate of his filly. No threat of recrimination escaped him; he did not even go to law to recover damages; but calmly awaited his plan and hour of revenge. It came at last.

Watt Dood had a Durham heifer, for which he had paid a heavy price, and upon which he counted to make great gains.

One morning, just as Obediah was sitting down to breakfast, his eldest son came in with the information that neighbor Dood's heifer had broken down the fence, entered the yard, and after eating most of the cabbages, had trampled the well-made beds and the vegetables they contained, out of all shape—a mischief it was impossible to repair.

"And what did thee do with her, Jacob?" quietly asked Obediah.

"I put her in the farm-yard."

"Did thee beat her?"

"I never struck her a blow."

"Right, Jacob—right; sit down to thy breakfast, and when done eating I will attend to the heifer."

Shortly after he had finished his repast, Lawson mounted a horse, and rode over to Dood's, who was sitting under the porch in front of his house, and who, as he beheld the Quaker dismount, supposed he was coming to demand pay for his filly, and secretly swore he would have to go to law for it if he did.

"Good morning, neighbor Dood; how is thy family?" exclaimed Obediah, as he mounted the steps, and seated himself in a chair.

"All well, I believe," was the crusty reply.

"I have a small affair to settle with you this morning, and I came rather early."

"So I suppose," growled Watt.

"This morning, my son found thy Durham heifer in my garden, where she has destroyed a good deal."

"And what did he do with her?" demanded Dood, his brow darkening.

"What would thee have done with her, had she been my heifer in thy garden?" asked Obediah.

"I'd a shot her!" retorted Watt, madly, "as I suppose you have done; but we are only even now. Heifer for filly is only 'tit for tat.'"

"Neighbor Dood, thou knowest me not, if thou thinkest I would harm a hair of thy heifer's back. She is in my farm-yard, and not even a blow has been struck her, where thee can get her at any time. I know thee shot my filly; but the evil one prompted thee to do it, and I lay no evil in my heart against my neighbors. I came to tell thee where thy heifer is, and now I'll go home."

Obediah rose from his chair, and was about to descend the steps, when he was stopped by Watt, who hastily asked,

"What was your filly worth?"

"A hundred dollars is what I asked for her," replied Obediah.

"Wait a moment!" and Dood rushed into the house, from whence he soon returned, holding some gold in his hand. "Here's the price of your filly; and hereafter let there be a pleasantness between us."

"Willingly, heartily," answered Lawson, grasping the proffered hand of the other; "let there be peace between us."

Obediah mounted his horse, and rode home with a lighter heart, and from that day to this Dood has been as good a neighbor as one could wish to have; being completely reformed by the RETURNING GOOD FOR EVIL.

DUELING.

From a Sermon by Rev. O. C. Wheeler, of San Francisco.

A duel is a personal combat between two individuals, at a time and place previously agreed upon, and according to arrangement previously made. It differs from the encounter, in this—that it is a matter of deliberation and arrangement, while the encounter takes place without preliminary preparation.

It was a practice wholly unknown to the ancients, and was brought into what are now the more enlightened Christian nations of Europe from the nations and tribes of the North.

At one time the practice was so rife among the Germaus, Danes and Franks, that the judicial combat was, by public opinion and common consent, made binding upon all classes, excepting women, invalids, and men over 60 years of age. This practice, by which even Ecclesiastics and Monks felt compelled to settle all judicial questions, not excepting titles to estates, was authorized by Cundebald, king of the Burgundians, as early as A. D. 501. The practice in settling titles to property and estates in this way, very naturally introduced the custom of settling all personal quarrels and disputes at the same bar; and in these settlements, the vanquished, if not killed outright, was hung, decapitated, or so mutilated in person, as to be a burden to himself and a disgrace to his friends during life.

Perhaps no one circumstance contributed so largely to the popularity of the duel, as the example of Francis I. of France, and Charles V. of Spain. When the treaty between these two sovereigns was broken up and war declared by the French herald at the court of Charles, on the 2d Jan., 1528, the emperor returned word that he should henceforth regard the French monarch as a violator of the public faith—wanting in the honor and integrity of a gentlemen. When Francis received this message, he at once returned a cartel of defiance, charged the emperor with falsehood, and challenged him to a single combat with his own choice of weapons, time and place. The challenge was accepted and held a long time in abeyance by the preliminary correspondence; but finally, the whole thing was abandoned without a "meeting." Yet it wrought like magic upon the whole European mind. Now every man, upon the least insult to his person, or his honor, felt at liberty, yea bound to draw the deadly weapon and demand "satisfaction." To such an extent did this spirit prevail, that during the 10 years of the reign of Henry IV., of France, not less than 6000 men fought in duels. In the year 1602, near the close of his reign, Henry issued a decree of great severity, against the practice; but there was so little efficiency among the officers of Justice, and so little virtue among the people, that the decree remained a dead letter. His successor, however, issued and executed another decree to the effect that any person, who should fight a duel should loose his offices and pensions, a third of his property, and be expelled from the kingdom three years. In 1627, two noblemen were beheaded for this offense, and in 1632, two other noblemen killed each other in a duel. Under this edict and in view of these circumstances, duels very rapidly decreased. And although Edward III. proposed a summary arrangement of all his difficulties with the French king by a personal combat between the two; and although Richard II., of England, offered to settle the title to the French crown by resort to a like tribunal; and although Phillip, of France, sent a formal challenge to Richard II., of England, yet, the duel has continued to decline, till at the present there are fewer men who would resort to it, and fewer who would give it any countenance, than at any previous time during the last 1000 years. Just as society has advanced, morals have been improved, and the hallowed influences of christianity have been brought to bear upon man, so has this practice become disreputable and gone into disuse.

TOILING IN ROWING.

BY L. H. S.

"And he saw them toiling in rowing, for the wind was contrary unto them. And about the fourth watch of the night he cometh unto them walking upon the sea."

Toiling in rowing! Wind and tide
Our wearied bark oppose,
As oft, with seams that open wide,
Upon her course she goes;
And we have taken nothing yet,
Though still the watch we keep,
Nor fail to cast an empty net
Into the boisterous deep.

Toiling in rowing! Dearest Lord,
We faint amid the strife;
But thou canst vanquish with a word
The stormy surge of life.
And when thou walkest on the sea,
With hand outstretched to aid,
O grant us strength to cling to thee,
And not to be afraid.

ANECDOTE OF FLAVEL.

By the Act of Uniformity, about two thousand Puritan minister were silenced from preaching, and deprived of the means of support. That act required every minister to subscribe the following declaration:—"I, A. B., do declare that it is not lawful, upon any pretense whatever, to take up arms against the King; and that I do abhor that traitorous position of taking arms without his authority against his person, or against those commissioned by him; and that I will conform to the liturgy of the Church of England, as it is now by law established."

When the day of subscribing to this enslaveing declaration came, Flavel, with about two thousand others, refused to subscribe, and were in consequence silenced and deprived of their livings.

The sufferings of the ejected ministers and their families were often great. If they ventured to preach ever so privately, and were detected, they were punished by fines and imprisonment. They were dependent upon charity for their food and clothing. "Many hundreds of them with their wives and children," says Mr. Baxter, "had neither house nor bread; the people they left were not able to relieve them, nor durst if they had been able, because it would have been called a maintenance of schism and faction. Many of the ministers, being afraid to lay down their ministry after they had been ordained to it, preached to such as would hear them in fields and private houses, till they were apprehended and cast into jails, where many of them perished."

Flavel remained at Dartmouth for a season, preaching privately to such as ventured to hear him; but the danger became so great that he determined to go to London, hoping that he might be safer there, and find greater opportunities for doing good. Accordingly he went on board a ship and set sail. A storm arose, threatening the destruction of the ship. Night came on, and the violence of the storm increased. About two o'clock in the morning, the sailors declared that there was no hope of their being saved, unless the wind should change, for they were fast drifting towards rocks, on which as soon as the vessel should strike, she would be dashed to pieces. Mr. Flavel then requested that all who could be spared from the deck should come into the cabin, and join with him in prayer. He prayed fervently for deliverance. No sooner was the prayer ended, than one came down from the deck, crying, "Deliverance, deliverance! God is a prayer-hearing God! The wind has this moment come fair west!" The wind speedily wafted them from the rocks, and brought them safely to London.

REV. THOMAS SCOTT AND HIS FAMILY.

The Rev. Thomas Scott records this emphatic testimony respecting his general course with his family:—"The grand secret of my success appears to have been this, that I always sought, for my children as well as for myself, IN THE FIRST PLACE, the kingdom of God and his righteousness. In his view this would extend not only to the instruction directly given, and the prayers offered on behalf of his family, but to his whole conduct respecting them; to the spirit and behavior habitually exhibited before them; to the value practically and evidently set upon eternal, in preference to temporal things; and very particularly to the disposal of them in life—the places of instruction to which they should visit, the connections which should be formed, and the openings which should be embraced or rejected for them."

Mr. Scott remarks, "that he had not attempted a great deal in the way of talking directly to his children, and drawing them forth to talk upon religious subjects; but much indirectly, by explaining the Scriptures, and by conversation in the family, especially by the improvement of passing events, of occurrences relating to their own conduct and that of religions remark—teaching them to take a religious and Christian view of whatever took place."

A SINGULAR FACT.—It is a singular circumstance in the history of European literature, that letters highly flourished in Iceland, between the tenth and fourteenth centuries. At a period when every art and science seemed to be expelled from the continent, they still continued to exist in no inconsiderable degree, in this barren and inhospitable island. The first edition of the Bible in Icelandic, is said to have been finished in the fifteenth century; and if so, they enjoyed this precious treasure in their own tongue previous to any nation in modern Europe.

THE SIN OF COVETOUSNESS.—We read in the Bible of persons falling into gross sins, and yet being restored and saved; but not of the recovery of one who was guilty of the sin of covetousness. Balaam, Gahazi, Judas, and Annanias and Sapphira are awful examples.

Be not affronted at a jest. If one throws salt at thee, thou wilt receive no harm, unless thou hast sore places on thee.

EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

We had hoped to give some account of the doings of this body in our last, but circumstances, over which we had no control, prevented. A brief notice, this week, must satisfy our readers till they can be put in possession of the Minutes, which will be published at an early day.

The session was held in Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., on the 22d, 23d, and 25th of last month, and was opened by a discourse from Eld. G. B. Utter, founded on Matt. 25: 29. The general doctrine of the text was illustrated in various particulars, and a special application of it was made to our denomination, showing that, unless we were faithful to improve the powers and opportunities which we have, God may take from us the trust which he has committed to us, and give it to a people who will bring forth the fruits thereof.

The number of delegates in attendance was about as large as usual. All the churches except Newport, we believe, were represented, and one new church—that at Greenmanville, Conn.—was received into fellowship.

We regret to say, that the letters from the churches showed, for the most part, a state of religious declension. The whole number of members is some thirty-five less than last year, if the returns were correctly made. Three or four of the churches only have enjoyed a gracious revival. Others stand as they were; while others, again, have been troubled with the root of bitterness springing up among them. God grant that the ensuing year may witness the interposition of the Most High to bless and comfort us.

A large portion of the Association's time was occupied in business of a painful character. At the last year's meeting a complaint was preferred by the 2d Hopkinton Church against the Church of Richmond, R. I., for receiving into its fellowship, and upholding the ministry of Eld. John Green. In consequence of this complaint, a Council was appointed by the Association to investigate the matter; and report the result. At this meeting the Report of the Council was submitted, from which it appeared that, at their session in November last, such developments were made in regard to the course of conduct pursued by Eld. Green for the last two years, as to create the conviction that he was no longer worthy to hold the office of a minister of the Gospel. We make the following extract from the Report:

"In regard to the charges brought against Eld. John Green in the letter adopted by the 2d Hopkinton Church and presented to the Association, the Council are of the opinion, that they were sustained by competent testimony. At the same time, the Council feel it to be but just to state, that some considerations were presented to them which served to modify their estimate of the criminality of the course pursued by Eld. Green; among which may be mentioned his apparent inability to remember his own conversations at different times, and his insensibility to the consequences which must flow from it. Nevertheless, the Council cannot find in these considerations a ground of justification for the conduct in question. Without attempting to determine the degree, comparatively, of Eld. Green's incapacity and criminality, the Council are of the deliberate and unanimous opinion, that they are such as effectually to disqualify him for the Gospel ministry. They therefore advise, that he suspend the exercise of ministerial functions until the next meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association in May, 1851, when the Report of this Council will be presented to and acted upon by that body."

This Report of the Council was approved by the Association, and by a resolution afterwards adopted the hand of fellowship was withdrawn from Eld. Green. By many, no doubt, this intelligence will be received with surprise, and especially by the numbers, who, in various parts of the country, have been edified and comforted by his ministry. As the matter will hereafter be given to the public in another form, we forbear any comments, farther than to say, that from the time Eld. G.'s conduct has been under investigation, every effort has been made, which tender and sympathizing hearts could make, to prevent that exposure of it, which has at last come, only because the cause of truth and righteousness would no longer justify a concealment. May God heal the wound that has been inflicted upon his cause.

On Sabbath day a very interesting Missionary discourse was delivered by Bro. W. M. Jones, after which a collection of some twenty-five dollars was taken for the Missionary Society. In the afternoon of the same day, Bro. A. B. Burdick gave a profitable discourse upon the practical observance of the Sabbath. In the evening, the nature and importance of Family Religion were exhibited by Bro. C. M. Lewis in a most excellent and well arranged sermon, founded on Joshua 24: 15. "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." On the morning of the following day Bro. Crandall presented the Publication interests of the denomination, after which a collection was taken for the Tract Society. In the afternoon Bro. N. V. Hull, of the Western Association, advocated, in a discourse founded on Rom. 5: 6—10, the certainty of the saints' salvation, based upon the benevolence of God as displayed in the work of redemption.

Before the Association adjourned, the following preamble and resolution were presented by Bro. I. D. Titsworth, of Shiloh, and adopted:—

"Whereas Mrs. Tamar Davis, of Shiloh, N. J., has recently written and published a book purporting to be a History of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination; which book contains various historical inaccuracies, and also a number of improper personal criticisms upon the talents and abilities of several of our ministers, one of which we regard as being an unjust and ridiculous assault upon Bro. Wm. M. Jones—therefore Resolved, That this Association deems said book unworthy of a place in the libraries of Seventh day Baptists, or others, as a history of our people."

Next year the Association will meet with the Church in Waterford, Conn. Bro. Cochran is to preach the opening sermon.

ANNIVERSARIES IN BOSTON.

Various religious, reformatory, and benevolent societies held their anniversary meetings in Boston last week. We give a compendium of the proceedings:—

Massachusetts Bible Society.—The Anniversary meeting of this Society was held on the afternoon of Second-day, May 26. The President, Hon. Simon Greenleaf, LL. D., congratulated the members upon the increase of interest in the cause, and compared the effects of the influence of the Bible in the establishment of schools and hospitals and other measures of improvement of the race, with the condition of those countries where the Bible was not known. The Annual Report of the Executive Committee was read by Rev. Dr. Parkman. During the year there have been sold from its Depository 7,715 Bibles and 16,839 Testaments; total 24,554—of which 23,514 were in English; and the gratuities have amounted to 3,500 Bibles and 2,877 Testaments, in all 6,377—of these, 6,103 were in English, the remainder foreign. The Agent, Rev. Mr. Butler, has visited most of the States during the year, a new interest has been awakened, and additional auxiliaries established.

American Education Society.—The 25th Anniversary of this Society was held on the evening of Second-day, May 26. In a financial respect, the last year has been one of more than common prosperity. Though to a great extent without the usual appliances for collecting funds, the Directors take pleasure in reporting a balance in the Treasury of the Parent Society of $4,497 34, which is a balance of nearly two thousand dollars more than that of the preceding year. The aggregate of receipts and expenditures by the Parent Society and its auxiliaries, exclusive of the Society at Auburn, from which no report has been received, is as follows: Receipts from donations, legacies, &c, $27,591 97; balance on hand at the beginning of the year, $3,452 96; total available fund, $31,044 93; disbursements during the year, $25,263 96; balance in the Treasury, April 30, 1851, $4,780 97. While the expenses of the Society have been less than common, the legacies have been uncommonly large, and the donations have exceeded in the aggregate those of the preceding year. The number who have received aid from the Parent Society this year is 277; of these, 116 are engaged in the study of theology; the remaining 161 have not yet completed their classical studies. The whole number, including those of the Parent Society, is supposed to be about 400. These are scattered among our New England Colleges and Theological Seminaries, and over New York, Pennsylvania, and the distant West.

The American Peace Society celebrated its Anniversary on Second-day evening. In the absence of the President, the chair was taken by Samuel Greele of Boston, one of the Vice Presidents. Rev. Geo. C. Beckwith, Secretary, presented a brief abstract of the doings, the past year, of the Society. By agencies and publications there had been much done. Three lecturing agents had been under commission a part of the time, and the usual number of publications issued—among them the two admirable Reviews of the Mexican War, the Peace Manual, and a small Treatise on War, of 50 pages, which had been distributed to the amount of 8,000 copies. Several hundreds of petitions had poured in upon the three departments of the government, at the seat of which the Secretary spent some months, ensuring the passage of a resolution by the Senate in favor of national arbitration. The Society had been called to lament the death of several benefactors, among them Messrs. Roach of New Bedford, White of Philadelphia, Chandler of Boston, and Miss Waldo of Worcester. The receipts were $3,403 86; expenditures $3,241 42; leaving what was unusual, a balance in the treasury of $162 43.

Ladies' Society for Promoting Education at the West.—This Society's Anniversary took place on Third-day morning, May 27; Hon. Wm. J. Hubbard presiding. Rev. Mr. Eustis, of New Haven, stated the objects of the Society to be the sending of female teachers, educated at our best Seminaries to the towns and cities of the West, with a design to teach, convert, and evangelize, that portion of our country. During the last five years the Society had sent out 89 teachers, who had been the means of qualifying 200 other teachers, and converting 150 souls. The mission of women in this and similar benevolent and Christian enterprises was ably and eloquently argued in connection with the aims of the Society.

The New England Anti-Slavery Society held its meeting on Third-day morning, May 27. Edmund Quincy, Esq., was chosen President. Wendell Phillips, from the Business Committee, reported a series of eleven resolutions. The following gives the sense of the meeting on the theory of civil obedience:—

Resolved, That this is our theory of civil obedience. In matters indifferent the majority have a right to decide what the law shall be, and when such law is once made, every good citizen is bound to give his cordial aid in carrying it out, while it stands. In matters involving a moral right and wrong, while States are bound by the same rules of justice that individuals are, still, as long as government exists, it must be left with the majority to decide what, in their opinion, is right, and for the particular nation, that is law; but, in regard to such matters and such laws, the individual citizen has not only the right, but is bound, to refuse obedience, if he deems the acts ordered to be morally wrong, and to act, in his discretion, precisely as he would have done, had no such law existed.

The various resolutions were discussed with considerable spirit.

WARDER CRESSON.

The person bearing this name is, if we are not mistaken, a brother to the somewhat celebrated Elliot Cresson, who figured considerably as a zealous advocate of the Colonization Society a few years ago. Some of our readers will recollect him, as a man who embraced the Sabbath about ten years since. He lived, at that time, some ten or twelve miles from Philadelphia on a large and beautiful farm, where we, with some two or three of our brethren, once passed a night with him very pleasantly. He was then fully persuaded that the second coming of Christ was at hand, and was preparing to embark for Jerusalem, in the firm expectation that he would there witness the opening scene of the great and thrilling drama. We learned from him, that he was of Quaker origin, and that, becoming convinced of the error of that sect regarding the ordinances, he had been baptized; by whom, we do not now remember. The next thing we heard of him was, that he had gone to Jerusalem, and that previously to his departure he had taken care to secure for himself an appointment to the office of U. S. Consul for that place. Letters afterwards sent from Palestine by other persons, represented him as pursuing a strange and ridiculous course, though how much credit to give them we did not know. Afterwards we hear of him as renouncing the Christian religion, and embracing Judaism. A year or two since he returned to this country, and was soon after, at the instigation of his family, indicted before a jury of six persons, who returned a verdict that the said W. Cresson was insane, ordering his property to be placed in the hands of commissioners appointed for the purpose. Mr. Cresson, aggrieved at this decision, carried his case before the Court of Common Pleas for Philadelphia County. In this Court the case was tried week before last, and numerous depositions were taken on both sides. After the charge of the Judge, the Jury retired, and in an hour returned a verdict, "That the said Warder Cresson was perfectly sane, and fully capable of managing his own affairs." The names of the learned counsel were H. Hubbell, Josiah Randall, and Wm. Linn Brown, Esqrs., for the defendant, and David Paul Brown, Esq, for the plaintiffs. A correspondent of the Asmonean regards it as a case, which has involved questions of interest both to the Jew and Gentile; thus seeming to imply that it was a case in which religious liberty was in question, or the right of a man to change his religion doubted. But another correspondent repudiates this view, and says that "neither the honor, the veracity, the talents, or the religious opinions of the Israelites were made the subject of inquiry. The counsel for the commission introduced, it is true, some highly illiberal and unjustifiable reflections upon the Jewish witnesses in the case, for the purpose of weakening their testimony, by exciting old prejudices. But the jury repudiated the barbarism."

Progress of Scriptural Views.—The Rev. Dr. Lillie, who was four years pastor of the United Secession Congregation in Montrose, Scotland, and who has, since his residence in this country, to which he came in 1833, ministered in Associate Reformed, Dutch Reformed, and Presbyterian congregations, received the ordinance of baptism in the Mariner's Baptist Chapel in this city, at the hands of Rev. Dr. Cone, on Sunday the 25th ult. The same day, he delivered a discourse in defense of his new views, to a large concourse of people assembled in the First Baptist Church. He is represented to have studied theology in Selkirk under Dr. Lawson, in Edinburgh with Dr. Ritchie, but chiefly in Glasgow under Dr. Dick, author of the celebrated system of theology, and is spoken of in the N. Y. Weekly Chronicle as "a valuable acquisition to any denomination." We hope he will go on with his investigation and see whether God does not command him also to remember and keep holy the Sabbath day.

John Neal, Esq, Portland, Me.—We learn from one of our exchanges, that Mr. Neal, who has been for many years a distinguished scholar and lawyer, and had given his commanding influence in favor of theaters, politics, and the miserable controversies that have sprung up among them, has been lately converted by the power of Divine truth, and is now zealously, both with the tongue and pen, laboring to build up the faith he has been formerly so boldly destroying.

Neander's History.—The fourth volume of Torrey's Translation of Neander's Church History is in the press at Andover, and will be published by Crocker and Brewster of this city, in the course of the ensuing summer. It will make a volume of 600 or 700 pages, and will carry down the history, we believe, as far as it was printed at the time of the author's death. A further portion, down to the martyrdom of Huss, will be published from Dr. Neander's MSS.

ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, NEW YORK.

A communication from the Rector of this church to the Episcopal Recorder presents some interesting items. It appears that the house in which they worship—a large and imposing edifice fronting on Stuyvesant square—was completely paid for before it was consecrated, the funds for this purpose having been advanced by one individual, the Treasurer of the Corporation, whose security was the bonds of the Corporation mortgaging their real estate, which had been received from the Trinity Church as the original endowment of St. George's.

Within the last year sufficient property has been sold, to redeem every one of these bonds, which have been returned to the vestry forever cancelled and settled. The Corporation has remaining invested exclusive of the Church, of one hundred thousand dollars, the interest of which may be hereafter calculated upon at six per cent, as the interest of the Church. The annual pew rents of the Church are now over eleven thousand dollars, and there is a constant and increasing demand for further accommodations for new families. These two sources of income enable the vestry to complete all their buildings, from the excess of the annual income of the Corporation, without further diminishing the principal of the investment.

The number of communicants is nearly six hundred. The benevolent contributions in public collections in the congregation during the past year, amount to between five and six thousand dollars. Besides the usual Sunday sevices, lectures during the week, and every day during Lent from Ash Wednesday to Easter, an address at every funeral, and other occasional addresses, the rector has made over seven hundred pastoral visits to the families of the congregation and others, within the year. They have a Dorcas Society of ladies belonging to the congregation, who meet at the chapel on every Wednesday morning, and who have clothed one hundred and twenty-five children in the last year with 850 garments. A sewing society also in which one hundred and fifty poor children have been taught to sew, some of them very neatly and efficiently, and thus put in a way to earn their own living hereafter. A Sunday-School numbering 657 scholars and 50 teachers' An infant school of 180 boys and girls. Two Bible classes of young ladies numbering 70, and one of young men numbering 14. In connection with the Sunday-Schools, and as a missionary to the families of the poor in any way connected with this church, the Rector has appointed a person for whose support the vestry have made suitable provision.

Fishing on the Sabbath Day.—The question is about being tested in Cecil Co., as to the legality or illegality of fishing on the Sabbath. Messrs. Dungan and Evans, of Baltimore, who are fishing at Carperter's Point, applied for an injunction against Hasson Lynch, officer of that county, alledging that it was rumored that the said Lynch was about to arrest them for a violation of the Sabbath, for fishing upon the Sabbath day. The court dismissed the application on the ground that it was based on rumor only, remarking that they expressed no opinion whatever as to the legality or illegality of fishing on the Sabbath; they advised, however, that if any person contemplated testing this matter, that it be postponed till near the close of the fishing season, that parties largely interested in fishing might not be interrupted and subjected to loss, by arrest; and also, that the parties making the arrest might not be subjected to heavy damages, in the event of a decision that it is lawful to fish on the Sabbath day. [Baltimore Sun.

Our readers will of course understand, that the reference of the foregoing paragraph is—not to "the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," but—to the Sabbath of the State of Maryland. Hence the necessity of legal investigation, and such hair-splitting distinctions as lawyers are accustomed to make, in order to determine whether the labor of catching fish is more or less holy than that involved in other kinds of secular business. In New Jersey we are told, it is very wicked to take the common kinds of fish on Sunday, but is no sin to fish for shad.

A Minister's Sins of Omission.—The following appears in the Christian Advocate and Journal, a Methodist paper. Perhaps ministers of all denominations may take some portion of it to themselves:—

"My conscience accuses me of the following things:

1. Great negligence as to secret prayer.—Little time, little fervency, little intercession, little special prayer for my office or for my flock.

2. Great neglect of the Scriptures, as to private or ministerial edification; great absence of Scripture proof in my sermons; flimsy, confused views; no pains to ascertain their full meaning and connexion, or to make them bear on heart or conscience.

3. Great waste of time, in my studies, in sleep, in visits unnecessarily prolonged, in want of unity in effort, in desultory reading, and in beginning discourses.

4. Want of close application to my work, loitering about trifles, suffering anything to interrupt me, putting off what should be done immediately, and not writing enough."

☞ A literary notice in the N. Y. Tribune calls the attention of the reading public to "A General History of the Sabbatarian Churches," by Mrs. Tamar Davis, and sets forth that it is "a collection of facts with regard to the sect of Christians called Seventh-day Baptists;" and that "it displays considerable research, and presents many curious details." As this notice may mislead some, we deem it proper to say that the History alluded to is a worthless production, and not entitled to confidence. It is loose in its arrangement, and grossly inaccurate in its statement of facts. We hope no one will receive it as a correct picture of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination. It may be well to add, that there is in process of preparation by the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society a history of the denomination, which will make its appearance in due time—one which, we trust, will be in all respects reliable.

The Great Methodist Suit.—The important legal suit which has been so long in anticipation between the two segments of the Methodist Church is now on trial in New York, attracting a large share of legal and ecclesiastical interest. The pecuniary stake involved in the case is not small; but the great interest relates to the ecclesiastical aspect of it—whether the Southern Church in seceding, because the old and time-honored canons of Wesley respecting ministers holding slaves were enforced, was a really constitutional and righteous procedure. The suit is brought in the name of Dr. Bascom, since dead, in behalf of the "Church South," to recover a share of the property vested in the church before the rupture. The claim to this property has been resisted by the "Church North," on account of the illegality of the secession. Daniel Lord, Esq., an Elder in Dr. Spring's church, and Hon. Reverdy Johnson, Baltimore, appear as attorney's for the plaintiffs; and Hon. Thomas Corwin, Rufus. Choate, and George Wood, Esqrs., for the defense.

A Christian Statesman.—The Hon. Jas. Morris, Postmaster General of Canada, arrived in this city from Washington, on Saturday, a few weeks since. He remained in town over Sunday, and left for Canada by the Niagara Falls rail-road on Monday morning. Mr. Morris has, through the course of a well-spent life, made the strict observance of the Sabbath a primary object, from which nothing but the most urgent necessity could induce him to swerve. So great is his respect for that sacred institution of the Christian Church, that, whether engaged in the duties of a merchant or a legislator, he has never for a moment allowed business arrangements or state affairs to induce him to travel, or to devote the solemn hours of Sabbath rest to their consideration. He is a noble, living exemplification of a character in which the statesman, the Christian, and the gentleman are harmoniously blended.

Mr. M. appears to be true to his principles, and for his own sake we are glad of it. But for the sake of that holy institution, whose name is so grossly misapplied in the foregoing paragraph, we could wish that he might fall into the hands of some one who would expound to him the way of God more perfectly.

Colored Episcopalians.—The following abstract of parochial reports of the Episcopal Church in South Carolina shows how important an element the people of color constitute in their numbers, and calls forth a variety of thoughts as we reflect how large a majority of the members of that church have no voice in its affairs, and how many who are "Christ's freedmen" are still man's slaves by the voice of Christ's church:—

The British and Foreign Bible Society held its anniversary on the 7th of May, in Exeter Hall, London. Lord Ashley presided. The report records the death of three of its officers, during the past year—the Depositary, Mr. Cockle, the Clerical Secretary, Rev. Mr. Brandram, and the President, Lord Bexley. The meeting was addressed by the Bishops of Cashel and Bombay, and other noblemen, by clergymen of various denominations, among whom was the Rev. Dr. Murray, the delegate of the Am. Bible Society. Lord Ashley is the new President; Rev. John Collison, of the Established Church, the new Clerical Secretary, and Mr. Franklin, Depositary.

Doctors of Divinity in the Dutch Church.—The Reformed Dutch Church are conferring on all their ministers the title of Doctor of Divinity. The Classis of Cayuga has resolved that "as all ministers of the gospel are of equal rank, and as all, according to the proper meaning of the words, are Doctors [teachers] of Divinity," therefore that title belongs to all its ministers. The same principle has been adopted by the Classis of Albany. The Consistories of some of the churches have also resolved to address their pastors by that title as belonging to them ex-officio.

Missionaries in China.—There are 75 Protestant missionaries at the several stations in China, connected with fifteen different missionary associations, or one to about every five million of souls. Since 1842, the year when the five ports were made accessible to Christian missionaries, the number of societies laboring for the evangelization of China, has doubled, and the number of missionaries increased from twenty to seventy-five.

The Temperance Cause in England.—The Editor of the N. Y. Daily Tribune, now on a visit to the World's Fair, writes home concerning the habits of the English as follows:

"The cause of Temperance—of Total Abstinence from all that can intoxicate—is here about twenty years behind its present position in the United States. I think there are not more absolute drunkards here than in our American cities, but the habit of drinking for drink's sake is all but universal. The aristocracy drink almost to a man; so do the middle class; so do the clergy; so alas! do the women! There is less of ardent spirits imbibed than with us; but wines are much cheaper and in very general use among the well-off; while the consumption of ale, beer, porter, &c., (mainly the poor) is enormous. Only think of £5,000,000 or twenty-five millions of dollars, paid into the treasury in a single year by the people of these islands as malt tax alone, while other ingredients used in the manufacture of malt liquors probably swell the aggregate to thirty millions of dollars. If we suppose this to be a little more than one-third of the ultimate cost of these liquors to the consumers, that cost cannot be less than one hundred millions of dollars per annum!—a sum amply sufficient, if rightly expended, to banish pauperism and distitution for ever from the British Isles. And yet the poor trudge wearily on, loaded to the earth with exactions and burdens of every kind, yet stupifying their brains, emptying their pockets and ruining their constitusions with these poisonous brutalizing liquors!"

Methodist Church Polity.—A writer in the Northern Christian Advocate indicates three important questions to come before the next General Conference of the M. E. Church, in all of which the old itinerants generally take one side and the younger and more educated preachers the other. They are the allowance of pewed Churches, the increase of Bishops and giving them a diocesan jurisdiction, and the repeal of the rule which allows a preacher to occupy the field for only two years in succession.

"There was once a necessity for the restrictive rule referred to, there is no doubt. But now with our varied and talented, educated and efficient ministry, it has come to be a matter of settled conviction in the minds of many, that this rule uselessly works mischief to the laity, oppression to the ministry and injury to the Church; and cripples the episcopacy in its appointing duties. What shall be done? Shall we cling to the old system because it has worked well in its day? Or shall we follow the openings of Providence, and thereby reap a larger harvest, and remedy many of the unnecessary evils under which we now labor?"

Woman's Rights' Convention.—A Convention met at Akron, Summit Co., Ohio, on Wednesday last, for discussion and action upon the whole subject of Woman's Rights, Duties, Education, &c. It has been called under the direction of a Committee appointed at a similar Convention held last year in Salem, Columbiana Co., whose proceedings were reported for the Tribune, as its readers will not fail to remember. The Convention this year will be open for men as well as woman, though the latter will probably take the most prominent part in its management as well as in its debates. Several able female speakers will be present, and among them Mrs. Emma R. Coe, of whose intellectual endowments and captivating eloquence many Western journals have spoken in very eulogistic terms. Many other eminent women will contribute to the interest of the Convention by letters expressive of their sympathy in the moment, and of their views of the principles it involves, and the measures it calls for. The Hutchison Family, we hear, are to be in attendance.

A Custom in England.—A writer in an exchange paper, in stopping there for a season, in making the tour to Europe, thus speaks:—

"O, there is one thing that I see in England every where in places of worship, that I long to see adopted in our own New England. I allude to a deep, quiet, solemn composure all over the congregation at the close of service when the benediction is uttered. It lasts for half a minute. Not a head is raised, not a foot stirs, and there is a reverennce apparent."

Church of England Missions.—The Bishop of London, lately ordained two colored candidates, Messrs. Maxwell & Nicholl to be stationed at Sierra Leone, under the Church Missionary Society. It is proposed to organize a Church Mission of this Society for West Africa among the freed people of the West Indies, to have its field of labor east of the American Episcopal mission at Cape Patmos, and so along the Gulf of Guinea, including the Ashanti and Dahomy countries, Codrington College being the center of organization. It is intended to have a Bishop at Sierra Leone.

The Presbyterian Meeting House in Hamilton, Madison Co., N. Y., was recently destroyed by fire, together with an organ. The loss is estimated at $3,000, on which there was no insurance. They will find many generous friends in that community, who will sympathize with them and cheerfully aid them in rebuilding.

The Baptists in the Cherokee nation have fourteen houses of worship, six ordained native preachers, and twenty-six licentiates and exhorters. The Methodists have 2,000 members.

At Churchville, Monroe Co., N. Y., on the 1st., a young lady named Matilda Lyon was shot by Alvin Potter, a lad of 15 years, who levelled a rifle at her head, not supposing it to be charged.

Miss Martineau's English publisher has cancelled an engagement with her on account of her recent avowal of atheistical opinions.

The Roman Catholic church in Europe has 104 Archbishops, and 485 bishops.

There are in Hindostan twenty-six newspapers in the native language.

General Intelligence.

The Beaver Island Expedition.

The Detroit Advertiser of the 27th of May says: Yesterday morning, at a quarter past 9 o'clock, the U. S. Iron Steamer Michigan arriving at our dock, having on board U. S. Marshall Knox, and his posse, U. S. District Attorney, Hon. Geo. C. Bates, and Adj. Gen. Schwarz, having returned from Beaver Island, whence they went last week in pursuit of the celebrated James J. Strang, the self-constituted 'king of all the earth' and Beaver Island in particular, and three of his dutiful subjects named Joseph Ketchum, Finley Page and William Townsend. They were arrested, being charged with obstructing the U. S. mail, and assaulting with arms the mail carrier, counterfeiting U. S. coin, and depredations upon Government lands, &c. The sheriff of Mackinack County is also here, with several warrants against them for various offences. They were conveyed to the U. S. Court Room and placed in the custody of Deputy Marshall Beardsley, and we presume the case will be submitted to the Grand Jury during its sittings. Strang was formerly from Chautauque County, New York. The officers had but little difficulty in making the arrest. They first secured the District or Circuit Judge for the 'Upper Peninsular,' at Mackinack, who is also a Mormon. On satisfying him that they were prepared to accomplish their object in their arrest of Strang, and that opposition would be futile, the Judge wrote Strang a letter, informing him of the existing state of facts, and the 'king and court' of Beaver Island was soon in the hands of the officers without opposition—by voluntary surrender. The reputed career of this self-crowned and self-constituted 'king' and his followers on Beaver Island is known to the public. We await the developments of the facts in the case before the proper tribunals of the country. The 'chief prophet' was arrested, but was subsequently released with the Judge and others who were arrested. Strang, who is acknowledged to be the 'head and front' of all authority in the 'kingdom' is a tall, well proportioned person, weighing about 170lbs., some 40 years old, with an open countenance, indicating some cunning and shrewdness, but we should not judge, a very malicious character. The officers represent that the appearance of the Island does not indicate either thrift or industry. Those arrested protest their innocence of all offences of which they are chargad, either against the people of the "kingdom," foreign powers or the rest of mankind.

Trouble at Tehauntepec.

By papers from the City of Mexico, we have news from that city to the 3d ult. For some days a great deal of excitement was caused in the City of Mexico, by reports that a party of Americans had landed on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and taken forcible possession of all that section of country. One of the papers, the Sinceridad, reported that there had been a fight, and that fifty men had been killed on each side. Another rumor had it that the number of Americans was 4,000 and upward. These reports probably originated in the landing of the Gold Hunter at Ventosa, and the difficulties consequent thereon. The correspondent of the Trait d' Union says that the Americans were treated in the most shameful manner by the Mexican authorities. Some persons say that by the terms of the concession to Gary the Americans had a right to land at Ventosa, and that although the Senate has annulled the grant, its decision is not definitive, and that the question thus becomes a national one. On this subject the Trait d' Union remarks:

"We will not now treat the subject in this point of view; but we will say that if the authorities of Tehuantepec have acted as they ought those of Oajaca have proceeded with great want of tact and courtesy. This is the result of the evil course which for some time has been pursued by a portion of the Mexican press. Instead of cultivating the friendship of the United States, a neighboring Republic, whose evident interest is to remain on terms of amity with Mexico, the press of which we speak, on the contrary, endeavors to spread injurious reports of a nation, which the treaty of Guadaloupe imposes upon them the necessity of respecting at least. They seek to cherish among the Mexican people a hatred which, perhaps, may one day be fatal to their nationality."

Manufacture of Glass by Machinery.—The Boston and Sandwich Glass Company makes glass bowls by machinery, and of a magnitude that far exceeds in size and weight any heretofore made in this or any other country. The machine weighs between two and three tons, and is worked with the accuracy of a steam engine. The glowing metal is taken from the furnace, placed in the machine by hand, set in motion, and in a few minutes a perfect bowl of rich design is turned out, spreading a most intense heat around, which none but those accustomed to the business can stand. It is an interesting sight to notice the arrangement made for working the machine; there is no confusion—each workman is in his allotted place—and it is surprising to see an article of its size and weight handled with so much jndgment and skill, that in about one minute it is taken from the press by the head workman and carried to a side furnace to receive the fire polish, and formed into shape; as soon as that is secured it is taken to the annealing kiln, and placed therein to cool, which requires eight or ten days.

Items of News from New-Mexico.—The Santa Fe Weekly Gazette, referring to the fact that the administration of the new Governor was scarcely a month old, says it is universally conceded that he has proved himself a most active and efficient officer. Gov. Calhoun concluded a treaty with Chaco and his confederates, Chiefs of the Apaches, living east of the Rio Grande. By this treaty, the Indians are restricted to such limits as may be assigned by our Government, and are bound to settle down in Pueblos, and the Government engages to furnish them facilities to till the soil. Ceran St. Vrain and Facundo Pino have been appointed aids-de-camp to the Governor, with the rank of Col.; Robert T. Brent, Auditor of Public Accounts; Louis D. Sheets, Prefect and Judge of Probate Court; John G. Jones, Sheriff; James Stewart, Alcade of Santa Fe County. On the 25th March, Gov. Calhoun was visited by a delegation of Indians, from the Utahs, who came to inform the Department that nothing could be learned concerning the fate of the child and servant of Mrs. J. M. White. Judges Houghton and Beaubien had resigned their offices as District Judges. Early in April, N. Smith resigned his appointment as temporary Secretary of the Territory. He will not be, it is said, a candidate for Congress. Dr. Christian Muller committed suicide at Sante Fe on the 18th April.

Indian Difficulties in Minnesota.—The St. Paul Pioneer of the 15th ult. refers to a fresh outbreak between the Sioux and Chippewa Indians, from which it apprehends hostilities, notwithstanding the treaty of peace of last winter. This new quarrel commenced about the middle of April, upon disputed hunting grounds, between a party of Sioux hunters and a party of Chippewa hunters. A Chippewa half-breed was killed, and soon after a small party of Chippewa hunters went to a Sioux lodge in the night, and killed its inmates. Governor Ramsey has written to the Chippewa agent, Mr. Watrous, requesting him to demand of the Chippewa Chiefs the surrender of these murderers; but it is not probable they will be given up. In the mean time, the varous bands of Sioux, hearing of these atrocities, are stirred up with fell purposes of vengeance. A band of one hundred and thirty Wapaton Sioux warriors, armed and painted, had taken the war-path, and by the last accounts were directing their march against the Chippewas at Mille Lac. About the same time another small war party of Sioux from another band left, and it is believed are gone to attack the Chippewas who live near the river St. Crox. What further barbarities may result from those movements cannot be conjectured.

European News.—Since our last the steamer Canada has arrived. From the news brought by her we select the following:

Crowds continue to press into the Crystal Palace. The Queen makes a daily private visit. The receipts of one day had been as high as £3,008. Season tickets still sell at first price.

In the House of Commons, after some discussion, the further consideration of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill was postponed by consent to the 19th.

Advices from the Cape of Good Hope to the 4th of April, was most unsatisfactory. Sir Henry Smith had been compelled to fall back upon King William's Town, his force being inadequate to undertake anything general.

General Cavaignac is now prominently put forward as a candidate for the Presidency, and receives the support of M. Emilie Girardin. The leading journals seem to favor his views.

The tone of the Manchester market was improved in Liverpool and Manchester it is believed the extreme point of depression is past, and business will resnme its course.

The Seventh Census.—The Washington Republic of May 23, publishes the seventh census of the United States, complete, exhibiting also ahe apportionment of representatives in Congress. The following are the results:

Free States.—Free Inhabitants, 13,533,238; Slaves, 119.

Slave States.—Free Inhabitants, 6,393,757; Slaves, 3,175,783.

Districts and Territories.—Free Inhabitants, 160,824; Slaves, 3,687.

Total population 23,267,498. Representative population 21,832,625.

The whole number of Representatives is 233. The following States each have a Member added to the number of the apportionment:

Alabama, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Maryland, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas.

New York will have 32 Members by ration and 1 for fractions. Virginia is only entitled to 13 members.

The Republic says: "We understand the correctness of the returns are not yet entirely vouched; but we presume they are sufficiently so as to render it probable there will be no change in the aportionment as given."

Mormon Progress.—The progress of the Mormons is like the gathering of a snow ball. Mr. Taylor, one of the Mormon Missionaries sent out from Salt Lake Valley, writes from Europe that two large establishments are fitting out in London for the city of Salt Lake. One comes out for the purpose of manufacturing broad and other cloths, vestings, merinos, alpacas, and other fabrics of that description, together with shawls, blankets, flannels, &c. The other establishment spoken of, comes out for the purpose of manufacturing sugar from the beet root, on the same principle as in France. These will require a great deal of machinery, which it is contemplated to bring out, together with men to work it, being to manufacture everything to be required in the valley, so as not to be necessitated to purchase it elsewhere.

A Bottle Picked Up.—The New Orleans Picayune of the 23d ult., says: A gentleman at the Brazos Santiago sends us a paper which was found inside a closely corked bottle picked up on the beach a short distance from the Brazos, a few days since. Our correspondent says that by the date, the Crescent City must have made several passagee since, and the occurrence mentioned has no doubt been published.

He therefore sends us the paper rather with the view of giving the fact of the long passage of the bottle, and something worthy the attention of nautical men. It was thrown overboard on the 20th December, 1850, in lat. 15° 25′ N. and was picked up May 5, 1851, in lat, 26° 06′ N. lon. 79° 15′ W., immediately on drifting ashore.

From Port-au-Prince.—By the arrival at this port of the schooner Tremont, Captain Mitchell, we have advices from Port-au-Prince to the 12th inst., two days later than the intelligence received by way of Boston. Capt. M. reports that all was quiet when he left, and the place was very healthy. Bobo still remained at large, concealed in the mountains. The reports current are confirmatory of the previous report, that the Emperor had refused to accede to the propositions of the American Commissioner. Coffee was scarce and high, and American produce plenty.

Legal vs. Lawful.—Judge Lowrie, in the District Court of Pittsburg, Pa., in a decision lately rendered, made a distinction between the words "legal" and "lawful," which may be of some importance to executive officers in other sections. At the late riots in that city the Sheriff engaged several volunteer companies to protect the rolling mills, stipulating to pay the companies for their services. The law making counties liable for damages arising from riots requiring the Sheriff's to take all legal means to prevent injury. The Judge held that in the present instance the means employed might be lawful as they were not forbidden; but they were not legal, because not prescribed by the law. By the common law, the Sheriff was authorized to demand the attendance of a number of armed citizens, to aid him in his duty, but he had no authority to hire military companies to do for a compensation what they and every man were bound to do as a matter of public duty.

SUMMARY.

The editor of the Philadelphia Pennsylvanian has seen a piece of mechanism, which, for its complexity, novelty, and accuracy of movements, excels any thing ever witnessed. It was a band of automaton musicians, nine in number. It consisted of a bass drummer, three bass horns, two trumpets, a clarionet, and two flutes. The musicians were dressed in the Tyrolese costume, and arranged in a line. The accuracy, fidelity, and harmony with which they executed some of the most difficult pieces was a matter of astonishment to the gentlemen present. Each musician is moved by a power separate and distinct from his companion, and the accuracy of the movements of their heads, arms, and fingers attracted great admiration. They can be arranged to play any piece of music.

The tornado at St. Louis on the 17th of May, previously reported by telegraph, injured not less than one hundred buildings. The front of Mrs. Morel's millinery establishment was blown out, and a Mrs. Mawley was buried in the ruins and much injured. The fine steeple of the Baptist Church, corner of Sixth and Locust-streets, was blown down. A gentleman was knocked off his horse by a falling shutter. Roofs, chimneys, and walls were blown down and much other damage done. The boats in the river did not suffer.

William Fulton, convicted of counterfeiting, was recently sentenced, in Delaware, to pay a fine of $500; be placed in the pillory for the space of an hour; undergo an imprisonment for the space of three calendar months, and to wear a Roman T, of a scarlet color, six inches long and two inches broad, on the outside of his coat between the shoulders, for two years from the date of the expiration of his imprisonment It appears that this is the law in the State of Delaware.

There is a needle factory in Newark, the only one in the United States. It is carried on by Mr. Henry Essex, formerly a workman with Hemming & Son. He is quite successful, except for the tax imposed on his industry by the wisdom of Congress—that is, he is obliged to import his wire under a duty of 30 per cent., while English made needles pay but 20 per cent. duty—to encourage home industry, as no such wire is made in this country, or likely to be.

The fruit prospect in Delaware Co., Pa., is not very promising for peaches. The Chester Republican says there will not be half a crop of peaches, and that the same will be the case in the extensive orchards of the Messrs. Raybold and others, in Delaware. Of cherries, apples, and plums, there will be, from present appearances, quite an abundance.

The U. S. sounding steamer Hartzell, Lieut. John Rodgers commanding, has been engaged in efforts to sound the Gulf Stream. At about thirty miles southwest from Key West, bottom was obtained at 730 fathoms, but at another point, the sounding line, at the depth of 3,000 fathoms, was cut off, as was supposed, by a sword-fish.

Two brothers in Guildhall, Vt., by the name of Pelom, lately got into a dispute about the ownership of a harrow, which resulted in the death of one of them. One attacked the other with a stake, and he in self-defense struck him on the head with his fist, the blow fracturing the skull. The injured man lived about six hours.

A. J. Dallas, a government clerk, and Arthur Hooe, a merchant of Washington, had a fist-fight last Monday—and then the former sending a challenge to the latter, they both started for Bladensburg, for a duel. The police, advised of the fact, arrested them while arranging the preliminaries—and thus preserved their valuable lives to the country.

James Brewster, Esq., of New Haven, advocates a change in the rate of interest in his State, from 6, as it now is, to 7 per cent., on the ground that New York allows 7 per cent., and thereby draws large amounts of capital from Connecticut.

Thomas Patterson has been convicted in New Orleans of manslaughter in having stabbed, and thereby caused the death of a very old Scotchman named Ross. Just previous to the commission of the offence, they were seated together in a bar-room. Ross was maintaining the supremacy of the British flag, and, when leaving the bar-room addressed an observation to Patterson nationally offensive, whereupon Patterson left his seat, and following the old man, stabbed him in two or three different places with a knife. He was taken to the Charity hospital, and one of his wounds being mortal, he died two days after.

A shocking affair recently occurred on the railroad between Utica and Buffalo. Mr. E. Millet, of Birmingham, Mich., was returning home with his insane son, and became separated from him a few minutes at a stopping place. After the cars had started the father missed his son, and found on inquiry that the conductor had put him off the train because he could not pay his fare nor give any account of himself. The father returned, and found the mangled corpse of his son lying on the track. The fare of both had been paid before the train started.

On the steamer Iroquois, lately on the way from New Orleans to Cairo, the cholera broke out among the deck passengers, and six of them died, and were buried along the shore before the boat reached Cairo. A man by the name of Cane, who left a family in Illinois, and had been to California, was stricken down and died, and was buried when within ten miles of his own home. It is noteworthy that the American great enterprise is by a private company the Russian is built by Government.

In Petersburg, N. Y., May 10th, by Eld. J. Summerbell, Mr. Edgar R. Green to Miss Eliza O. Greenman, all of Berlin, N. Y.

DIED,

In Alfred, N. Y., May 16th, in the 67th year of his age, Mr. Nathan Green. He was one of the earliest settlers of Alfred, and the first Sabbath-keeper that took up his residence in that town. He drew up the articles of agreement, and was one of the number who composed the first Christian organization. And when, afterwards, this organization was lost in another and more perfect one, namely, the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, brother Green was chosen its Clerk, which post he filled, with honor to himself, and to the entire satisfaction of the Church. In many other ways did he render aid and peculiar succor to the infant Church, of which he remained a faithful and worthy member while it pleased God to grant him power to act. And now that he has passed from his field of labor to his home of rest, may it please the great Head of the Church to grant comfort to the bereaved, and that the place now vacated in the Church be worthily filled by another.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. Edwards, E. A. Park, and M. Stuart, of Andover; Dr. Robinson and H. B. Smith, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has beee received in the short time which has elapsed since thn union was made public, and the universal approbatiog of the measure which the publisher is daily receivin through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

Terms.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the Bibliotheca Sacra, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf with marbled edges, at $25 00.

☞ Orders should be addressed to

THE GREAT EXHIBITION BUILDING.

The Crystal Palace.

In the early months of last year the Great Exhibition had become as nearly a "fixed fact" as any thing in the future can be. The place where and the building in which it was to be held, then became matters for grave consideration. The first point, fortunately, presented little difficulty, the south side of Hyde Park, between Kensington-road and Rotten-row, having been early selected as the locality.

The construction of the edifice, however, presented difficulties not so easily surmounted. The Building Committee, comprising some of the leading architects and engineers of the kingdom, among whom are Mr. Barry, the architect of the new Houses of Parliament, and Mr. Stephenson, the constructor of the Britannia Tubular Bridge, advertised for plans to be presented for the building. When the Committee met, they found no want of designs; their table was loaded with them, to the number of 240. Their first task was to select those which were positively worthless, and throw them aside. By this process the number for consideration was reduced to about sixty; and from these the Committee proceeded to concoct a design, which pleased no body—themselves least of all. However, the plan, such as it was, was decided upon, and advertisements were issued for tenders for its construction. This was the signal for a fierce onslaught upon the proceedings of the Committee. For the erection of a building which was to be used for only a few months, more materials were to be thrown into one of the main lungs of the metropolis, than were contained in the eternal pyramids of Egypt. Moreover, could the requisite number of miles of brickwork be constructed within the few weeks of time allotted ? and was it not impossible that this should, in so short a time, become sufficiently consolidated to sustain the weight of the immense iron dome which, according to the design of the Committee, was to rest upon it ?

The Committee, fortunately, were not compelled to answer these and a multitude of similar puzzling interrogatories which were poured in upon them. Relief was coming to them from an unexpected quarter; whence, we must go back a little to explain.

On New Year's Day, of the year 1839, Sir Robert Schomburgk, the botanist, was proceeding in a native boat up the River Berbice, in Demarara. In a sheltered reach of the stream, he discovered resting upon the still waters an aquatic plant, a species of lily, but of a gigantic size, and of a shape hitherto unknown. Seeds of this plant, to which was given the name of "Victoria Regia," were transmitted to England, and were ultimately committed to the charge of Joseph Paxton, the horticulturist at Chatsworth, the magnificent seat of the Duke of Devonshire. The plant produced from these seeds became the occasion, and in certain respects the model, for the Crystal Palace.

Every means was adopted to place the plant in its accustomed circumstances. A tropical soil was formed for it of burned loam and peat; Newcastle coal was substituted for a meridian sun, to produce an artificial South America under an English heaven; by means of a wheel, a ripple like that of its native river, was communicated to the waters of the tank upon which its broad leaves reposed. Amid such enticements the lily could not do otherwise than flourish; and in a month it had outgrown its habitation. The problem was therefore set before its foster-father to provide for it, within a few weeks, a new home. This was not altogether a new task for Mr. Paxton, who had already devoted much attention to the erection of green-houses; and within the required space of time, he had completed this house for the "Victoria Regia," and therein, in the sense in which the acorn includes the oak, that of the Crystal Palace.

While Mr. Paxton was planning an abode for this Brobdignagian lily, the Building Committee of the Exhibition were poring wearily over the 240 plans lying upon their table. They had rejected the 180 worthless ones, and from the remainder had concocted. as we have said, with much cogitation and little satisfaction, their own design. Such as it was, however, it was determined that it should be executed—if possible.

This brings us down to the middle, or to be precise, to the 18th of June, on which day Mr. Paxton was sitting as chairman on a railway committee. He had previously made himself acquainted with the case laid before them, and was not therefore under the necessity of now devoting his attention to it. He took advantage of this leisure moment to work out a design for the Exhibition Building, which he had conceived some days previously. In ten days thereafter elevations, sections, working plans, and specifications, were completed from this draft, and the whole was submitted to the inspection of competent and influential persons, by whom it was unanimously announced to be practicable, and the only practicable scheme presented.

This design was then laid before the contractors, Messrs. Fox and Henderson, who at once determined to submit a tender for the construction of a building in accordance with it. In a single week, they had calculated the amount and cost of every pound of iron, every pane of glass, every foot of wood, and every hour of labor which would be required, and were prepared with a tender and specifications for the construction of the edifice. But here arose a difficulty. The Committee had advertised only for proposals for carrying out their own design; but, fortunately, they had invited the suggestion on the part of contractors, of any improvements upon it; and so Mr. Paxton's plan was presented simply as an "improvement" upon that of the Committee, with which it had not a single feature in common. This, with certain modifications, was adopted, and the result is the Crystal Palace—itself the greatest wonder which the Exhibition will present—the exterior of which is represented in our accompanying Illustration.

The building consists of three series of elevations of the respective heights of 64, 44, and 24 feet, intersected at the center by a transept of 72 feet in width, having a semicircular roof rising to the height of 108 feet in the center. It extends in length 1851 feet from north to south, more than one-third of a mile, with a breadth of 456 feet upon the ground; covering 18 superficial acres, nearly double the extent of our own Washington-square; and exceeding by more than one half the dimensions of the Park or the Battery. The whole rests upon cast-iron pillars, united by bolts and nuts, fixed to flanges turned perfectly true, so that if the socket be placed level, the columns and connecting-pieces must stand upright; and, in point of fact, not a crooked line is discoverable in the combination of such an immense number of pieces. For the support of the columns, holes are dug in the ground, in which is placed a bed of concrete, and upon this rest iron sockets of from three to four feet in length, according to the level of the ground, to which the columns are firmly attached by bolts and nuts. At the top, each column is attached by a girder to its opposite column, both longitudinally and transversely, so that the whole eighteen acres of pillars is securely framed together.

The roofs, of which there are five, one to each of the elevations, are constructed on the "ridge and furrow principle," and glazed with sheets of glass of 48 inches in length. The construction will be at once understood by imagining a series of parallel rows of the letter V, (thus W,) extending in uninterrupted lines the whole length of the building. The apex of each ridge is formed by a wooden sash-bar with notches upon each side for holding the laths in which are fitted the edges of the glass. The bottom bar, or rafter, is hollowed at the top so as to form a gutter to carry off the water, which passes through transverse gutters into the iron columns, which are hollow, thus serving as water-pipes; in the base of the columns horizontal pipes are inserted, which convey the accumulated water into the sewers. The exhalations, from so large an extent of surface, from the plants, and from the breath of the innumerable visitors, rising and condensed against the glass, would descend from a flat roof in the form of a perpetuel mist, but it is found that from glass pitched at a particular angle the moisture does not fall, but glides down its surface. The bottom bars are therefore grooved on the inside, thus forming interior gutters, by which the moisture also finds its way down the interior of the columns, through the drainage pipes, into the sewers. These grooved rafters, of which the total length is 205 miles, are formed by machinery, at a single operation.

The lower tier of the building is boarded, the walls of the upper portion being composed, like the roof, of glass. Ventilation is provided for by the basement portion being walled with iron plates, placed at an angle of 45 degrees, known as luffer-boarding, which admits the air freely, while it exexcludes the rain. A similar provision is made at the top of the building. These are so constructed that they can be closed at pleasure. In order to subdue the intense light in a building having such an extent of glass surface, the whole roof, and the south side will be covered with canvas, which will also preclude the possibility of injury from hail, as well as render the edifice much cooler.

In the construction of the building care has been taken to give to each part the stiffest and strongest form possible in a given quantity of material. The columns are hollow, and the girders which unite them are trellis-formed. The utmost weight which any girder will ever be likely to sustain is 7½ tons; and not one is used until after having been tested to the extent of 15 tons; while the breaking weight is calculated at 30 tons. At first sight, there would seem to be danger that a building presenting so great a surface to the action of the wind, would be liable to be blown down. But from the manner in which the columns are framed together they cannot be overthrown except by breaking them. Experiments show that in order to break the 1060 columns on the ground floor, a force of 5360 tons must be exerted, at a hight of 24 feet. The greatest force of the wind ever known is computed at 22 pounds to the superficial foot; assuming a possible force of 28 pounds, and suppose a hurricane of that momentum to strike at once the whole side of the building, the total force would be less than 1500 tons—not one-fourth of the capacity of the building to sustain, independent of the bracings, which add materially to its strength. So that, if any reliance at all can be placed upon theoretical engineering, there can be no doubt as to the safety of the building.

Entering at the main east or west entrance, we find ourselves in a nave 64 feet in height, 72 in breadth, and extending without interruption the whole length of the building, one-third of a mile. Parallel with this, but interrupted by the transept in the center, are a series of side aisles of 48 and 24 feet in breadth, with a hight of 44 and 24 feet. Over the center of the nave swells the semicircular roof of the transept, overarching the stately trees beneath—a Brobdignagian green-house with ancient elms instead of geraniums and rose bushes. The whole area of the ground floor is 772,784 square feet; and that of the galleries 217,100; making in all within a fraction of one million square feet; to which may be added 500,000 feet of hanging-space, available for the display of the products of human heads and hands.

There are three refreshment rooms, one in the transept, and one near each end, around the trees which were left standing, where ices and pastry for the wealthy, and bread-and-butter and cheese for the poorer are to be furnished. No wine, spirits, or fermented liquors are to be sold; only tea, coffee, and unfermented drinks; pure water is to be furnished gratis to all comers by the lessees of the refreshment rooms.

In respect to the decoration of the interior, a keen controversy has been waged. The fact of iron being the material of construction renders it necessary that it should be painted to preserve it from the action of the atmosphere. On the one hand, it is said that the fact that the structure is metallic should be indicated by the decoration, otherwise the whole will have no appearance of stability than an arbor of wicker-work. Those who take this view recommend that the interior should be bronzed. On the other hand, those to whom the decoration is intrusted affirm that the object of using color is to increase the effect of light and shade. If the whole were of one uniform dead color the effect of the inummerable parts of which the building is composed, all falling in similar lines, one before the other, would be precisely that of a plane surface; the extended lines of pillars presenting the aspect of a continuous wall. In order to bring out the distinctive features of the building various colors must be used; and experiments show that a combination of the primary colors, red, blue, and yellow, is most pleasant to the eye. The best means for using these is to to place blue, which retreats, upon the concave surfaces, yellow, which advances, upon the convex ones, reserving red for plane surfaces. But as when these colors come in contact each becomes tinged with complementary color of the other—the blue with green, the red with orange—a line of white is interposed between them. Applying these principles, the shafts of the columns are to by yellow, the concave portions of their capitals blue, the under side of the girders red, and their vertical surfaces white.

Among all the wonders of the Crystal Palace nothing is more wonderful than its cheapness, and the rapidity of its construction. Possession of the site was obtained on the 30th of July; in a period of only 145 working-days the building was to all intents and purposes completed. As to cheapness it costs less per cubic foot than an ordinary barn. If only used for the Exhibition, and at its close returned to the contractors, the cost will be nine-sixteenths of a penny a foot; or, if permanently purchased, it will be one penny and one-twelfth. Thus: the solid contents are 33,000,000 cubic feet; the price if returned is £70,800, if retained £150,000. This simple fact, that a building of glass and iron, covering eighteen acres, affording room for nine miles of tables, should have been completed in less than five months from the day when the contract was entered into, at a cost less than that of the humblest hovel, opens a new era in the science of building.

As to the final destination of the Crystal Palace, it is the wish of the designer that it should be converted into a permanent winter garden, with drives and promenades. Leaving ample space for plants, there would be two miles of walks in the galleries, and the same amount for walks upon the ground floor; in summer the removal of the upright glass would give the whole the appearance of a continuous walk or garden.

The whole Roman language, says Wesley does not afford so much as a name for humility, (the word from which we borrow this bearing in Latin quite a different meaning;) nor was one found in all the copious language of the Greeks, till it was made by the great Apostle.

How to Scatter a Mob.

A joke was played off in New York some twenty years ago which illustrates the fact that it is as easy to disperse a 'mass meeting' as it is to collect one. It was a time when infidelity was bold and defiant, and public meetings were held and violent demonstrations made in consequence of an attempt of the city government to enforce the laws against keeping shops open on Sunday. The tide of popular feeling was rising high under the artful management of a few leaders, and to give it a broad extension a meeting was appointed in the Park, and the whole city invited to attend. When the hour arrived a vast crowd assembled, but through some disagreement of the leaders, or some want of previous preparation of the business, a long time was spent without any organization of the meeting, and not a little confusion of the waiting masses was apparent. At length a stranger, a large man, with a stentorian voice, was seen entering the east gate and making his way towards the steps of the City Hall, crying out at every step, 'Make way! make way!' The crowd opened before him, and he passed up to the step and took an elevated position, and then lifted his voice so as to be heard by the assembled thousands, and said, 'All persons take notice—This meeting is now adjourned from this place, to meet immediately in Masonic Hall.' He then started in that direction, and was followed by the crowd, not one of whom appeared to know him, but all supposing him to have spoken by authority from some source. Having quickened his pace, and made several turns in different streets, he escaped from the sight of those following him, and was seen no more. The policemen, who from the nature of their business are in a way to mark every countenance, never saw him before nor afterwards. The joke, for such i twas, was completely successful. The crowd went in search of the meeting, and could not find it, and the people meeting in the Park having been thus hoaxed, had no disposition to return. The storm of popular passion that had been roused ended in a joke at the expense of its authors. The conjecture was that the mysterious personage with stentorian voice appeared there on a wager that he could dissolve the meeting. The result showed the ease with which a crowd may be hoaxed and set on a wrong track.

Great Discovery.

The English Railway Times has the following:

The decomposition of water has at length been obtained, and that at a merely nominal cost, and unerring precision. This great discovery, originating in America, has been perfected by the experiments of an eminent German chemist, and patented in the three kingdoms by Mr. Shepard. The carburetted hydrogen may be formed to any extent, which, while possessing an illuminating power equal to that of coal-gas, is capable of being itself applied to the same purpose as steam at a remarkably high pressure. This gas is also capable of producing an amount of caloric equal to that of live coal, and is consequently well and cheaply fitted to act as a combustible agent in the conversion of water into steam.

This tremendous power has been for some time engaging the attention of our most eminent engineers, and will, when sufficiently tested, be experimented upon before the public. If successful, as there is every present appearance of its being, the revolution that it must effect in the economic working of railways, and indeed in every branch of manufacture where steam is employed as a motive power, is altogether incalculable. It almost opens to the wondering gaze the Utopian vista in which unskillful manual labor shall be no longer necessary. It is sufficient for us, however, to state that several of the leading railway companies are in treaty with the patentee, and that consequently if anything whatever is capable of being made out of the discovery, the railway interest will possess at once the first benefit and chief honor of its realization.

Watt.

A young man, (says Sir R. Kane) wanting to sell spectacles in London, petitions the corporation to allow him to open a little shop without paying the fees of freedom, and he is refused. He goes to Glasgow, and the corporation refused him there. He makes acquaintance with some members of the university, who find him very intelligent, and permit him to open his shop within their walls. He does not sell spectacles and magic lanterns enought to occupy all his time; he occupies himself at intervals in taking asunder and re-making all the machines he can come at. He finds there are books on mechanics written in foreign languages; he borrows a dictionary, and learns those languages to read those books. The university people wonder at him, and are fond of dropping into his little room in the evenings, to tell him what they are doing, and to look at the queer instruments he constructs. A machine in university collection wants repairing, and he is employed. He makes it a new machine. The steam engine is constructed; and the giant mind of Watt stands out before the world—the author of the industrial supremacy of this country, the herald of a new force of civilization. But was Watt educated? Where was he educated? At his own workshop, and in the best manner. He learned Latin when he wanted it for his business. He learned French and German; but these things were tools, not ends. He used them to promote his engineering plans, as he used lathes and levers.

Gloucester and Marblehead Fisheries.

A statement has been recently published concerning the fisheries of Marblehead, and the number of vessels each year for the last half century. By this table we learn that the fisheries of Marblehead reached their highest point in 1801 and 1817, in which years nearly one hundred vessels were employed. From various causes the business has been declining there for several years past, until now only about twenty vessels are employed. The inhabitants, driven from their ancient pursuits, have been obliged to turn their attention to other employments, such as shoemaking, &c. A remarkable contrast with this declension of business is seen at the town of Gloucester. This ancient seat of the fisheries was for many years greatly distanced by Marblehead in the importance of its business, but now the business is carried on to a greater extent in Gloucester than in all the rest of Essex county together.

In 1830, Gloucester employed in her fisheries 60 small vessels and 500 men; this year she employs 200 vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 14,000 tons, manned by 2,000 men and boys. Thirty-five vessels have been added to the fleet this year; some of these are to replace those that have been sold. Seventeen packing establishments, with all the conveniences for pursuing the business, are conveniently located on various wharves in this splendid harbor; and such are the superior facilities and advantages here for the business, that vessels come to Gloucester to have their outfits furnished and fish packed from all parts of Maine, British Provinces, and other places.

One of the causes of the contrast between Gloucester and Marblehead is this—that Gloucester harbor is so much more convenient and capacious. The people of Marblehead have to haul up their vessels in Salem in Winter, such is the exposed state of Marblehead harbor. The same reasons have partly caused Nantucket to decline most sensibly for the last ten years, while at the present time New Bedford, with great facilities for business, is progressing at an unprecedented rate.

Both Gloucester and Marblehead have sustained great losses for the last ten years on George's and the Grand Banks; but the per centage of loss has been far more at Marblehead.

Beside the extensive fisheries of Gloucester proper, as alluded to, the little coves and harbors round Cape Ann, such as Rockport, Pigeon Cove, Lane's Cove, Squam Point, employ many small vessels and boats in the shore and mackerel fisheries, and the aggregate of the district exceeds that of any other in the United States in this important business.

Variety.

Among the English patents recently granted was one to a Mr. Rodway for an improved horse shoe, which is so constructed as to give the horse a secure foothold even upon wooden pavment, or wet ground, while it obviates the necessity of frost-nailing, or calkins, in frosty weather. The improvement consists in grooving the bottom of the shoe in a peculiar manner. The nails are also sunk in grooves so as never to becomes loosened by wear.

From the Christian Chronicle.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

The Sabbath Discussion, which was carried on in the columns of the Chronicle, has been published in the Recorder entire, up to the point where we were at first given to understand it would terminate. We have thus redeemed our promise. We would be glad to give our readers the 4th number of "Exodus'," reply to "J. N. B.," which the Chronicle declined publishing because it could not spare the room. And, if we could, we would gladly give the rejoinder of "J. N. B." in three successive numbers—some of them quite lengthy—for which the Chronicle found plenty of room. But we have occupied so much of our space with the discussion already, to the displacement of other important matter, that we feel bound to forego the gratification. On looking over the rejoinder of "J. N. B.," we find that a great deal of it is taken up in reiterating what has been said substantially before. To him it probably appears important, as a stronger mode of presenting the same ideas, but, for our part, we are otherwise impressed. We select from Part II. of his second series, his argument for the change of the day in honor of Christ's resurrection.

[Eds. Rec.

What I propose now to show is, that there is ample evidence in the Scriptures, that Christ, as the sole "Lord of the Sabbath day," changed the day of its observance in honor of His own resurrection; so that now the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, is the "Lord's day," or Christian Sabbath.

One fundamental part of that evidence is seen, (as I showed in my last article,) in the nature and necessity of the case—that is to say, in the new relations established by the work of Christ, and confirmed by His resurrection from the dead on that day. For "if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain," Christians, "ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." 1 Cor. xv. 17—20. Having briefly presented this part of the evidence already, I shall continue and confirm it, and then proceed to that which arises from miracle, prophecy, the personal sanction of Christ, and the example of His inspired Apostles.

At the very threshold of the Argument, in the name of Truth and Honesty, I have a demand to make of "Exodus," and on all of his opinions. Come out clearly, and show your colors. What do yon mean to do with the Decalogue? Not a trace of anything local, temporary, ceremonial, or shadowy, is in it. Everything is absolute, universal, perpetual Law—the Legislation of the Infinite Creator for men, His creatures. As such it is distinctly recognized by Christ and His Apostles. It is bound up inseparably as part and parcel of Christianity—as the the original moral standard. Sin is defined as a transgression of it. It is the Law of Conscience re-written by the finger of God—more fully and clearly. Matt. v. 17—32; xix. 16—19. Rom. vii. 7—14; viii. 4; xiii. 8—10. 2 Cor. iv. 5—18. 1 Tim. v. 5—11. 1 John iii. 4—10. Luke xvi. 17, 18.

Look calmly now at the case before us. Here is the Law of the Weekly Sabbath in the Decalogue—moral, positive, clear, benign—necessary for man as man, in all regions and in all ages. Here it stands before our eyes, the weekly memorial of creation—the natural safe-guard against idolatry—the grand means of practically uniting the created with the Creator—the perpetual sign of a covenant between them—in a word, the chief moral, social, and religious educator of the race. And yet you demand positive proof of its reënactment by Christ in explicit terms—or of an equally explicit account of its transfer to the first day, from the seventh of the Jewish calendar week. Demands, at once preposterous and presumptuous! By what right do you thus dictate to God the mode of his revelation? Besides, the burden of proof in the first instance, is not on me, but on you. You have first to prove that the Law of the Decalogue is abrogated before you demand proof of its re-enactment. Till this is done fully and fairly, till the argument from Matt. v., for example, be fairly met and set aside, (which "Exodus" has not even attempted in his reply,) you have no right to demand proof of any kind as to its present obligation. HERE IS THE SABBATH. Look at it. The seal of the world's Creator—of your Creator, and of mine—is upon it. Efface it if you can! Attempt it, if you dare!

But I love not the language of defiance, even in so strong a case as this. I prefer the language of earnest deprecation. Tell me not that Jesus Christ has come from Heaven to abrogate this Law—in the face of his own express declarations to the contrary. That Law was in His heart! Tell me not that He fulfilled, and by so doing superseded it. He did indeed fulfill it, in His faithful exposition, in his noble vindication, in His constant application, in His whole obedient life, and in His sin-atoning death, by which He redeemed us from THE CURSE, and secured the promise of the HOLY SPIRIT to write it forever in our heart of hearts! But all this was to honor it as immutable—not to abrogate it. In vain will you plead Paul's words to the Romans, "But now we are delivered from the law—that being dead wherein we were held." Paul does not say that the LAW is "dead," but its CURSE only, "in which we were held" by our guilt. (Gal. iii. 13.) This course is now "dead" as to believers—that is, deprived of all power to hurt us. And our deliverance, he expressly adds, is, "that we might serve in newness of spirit, not in the oldness of the letter." The authority of the Law then remains, vital and intact. Indeed Paul had explicitly guarded his meaning before. Rom. iii. 31. "Do we make void (i. e. abrogate) the Law through faith? God forbid. Yea, we establish the law." This is Paul's true doctrine, here and everywhere. It is identical with that of Christ. Perish the sophistry that would attempt to set them at variance!

The way then is clear to look at the real question, THE CHANGE OF THE DAY. This I have proved beyond dispute. It concerns merely the Jewish mode of reckoning the week, fixed by the miracle of the Manna, as explained by Moses. Exodus xvi. 22—30. This mode of reckoning was a special statute for Israel. It never bound any other people. It is alterable at the Divine pleasure. All we want in the case is, evidence that God has been pleased to alter it, and thus fix the Sabbath to another day. "Show us the miracle," says my friend Exodus, "and it sufficeth us." I propose now to show not only the miracle, but the Divine explanation of the miracle. I bespeak an earnest attention.

Let it be remembered then, that the first explicit declaration of faith in Jesus as the Messiah, was made at Cæsarea Philippi, about six months before our Saviour's death. Matt. xvi. 13—20. (See Townsend's Arrangement.) From that day Jesus explicitly announced his approaching Death and Resurrection. "After six days," says Matthew, "about eight days," says Luke, (ix. 18. 21.,) was the Transfiguration. Why this specification of time, if no special importance was attached to it? Both forms of expression indicate a week. The "eighth day" of Luke is particularly remarkable, since this very term was used to designate the day after a Jewish Sabbath, the first day of the week, (see Lev. xxv. 22,) particularly among the early Christians. John. xx. larly among the early Christians. John xx. 26. It is then highly probable, to say the least, that the glorious miracle of the Transfiguration was on that day. But that miracle was connected by some secret tie, with the miracle of the Resurrection; for the disciples were "strictly charged" not to mention it till after Jesus should rise from the dead. The resurrection we know was on the first day of the week. The connection of the two miracles is thus fully unfolded by Townsend in a Note to his Chronological Arrangement of the New Testament. (See Part iv. Note 22. p. 116.) "The other great purpose of the action on the mount (of Transfiguration) was, to give a figurative signification of the abrogation of the Mosiac Law, and the commencement of the Christian Dispensation, upon which it was to be established. Moses and Elias, as the representatives of the Law and Prophets, who had successively testified of the promised Messiah, it appears to me were now in their glorious state, permitted to behold on earth the magnificent completion of all their predictions; and by their farewell testimony to the truth of his Divinity afford to man the most powerful evidence that human reason could either receive or require. By their testimony they acknowledged the accomplishment of all their prophecies, and that the commencement of the Messiah's kingdom was established on the Law and the Prophets; and when the disciples, in an ectacy of happiness, desired to erect three tabernacles, God himself proclaimed, 'This is my beloved Son; HEAR YE HIM!' Moses and Elias instantly disappear, overshadowed by the bright cloud, and Christ alone remains the undivided object of all their worship. To Him alone are they to build their altars; to Him alone are they to look for happiness and glory; and He shall come again with His holy angels, and ten thousand times ten thousand shall stand before Him."

So much for the Miracle. Now for the Divine explanation of the Miracles, which fixes the first day of the week, or the day of Christ's Resurrection, as the Sabbath of the Christian Dispensation.

1. It is the Resurrection of "the Lord of the Sabbath." He had then all authority to change the day, so as to distinguish the new dispensation from the old. And to honor this day as His own chosen day, He met His assembled disciples on it, and said, Peace be unto you. Not till a full week afterwards was accomplished, did He meet with them again. John xx. 26. Was there no significance in this? Why did He not meet them sooner? Why not on the Jewish Sabbath?

2. It is the Resurrection of the Son of God to immortal life in Heaven. It is for this reason the day is beautifully called His Birth Day. Ps. ii. 7. "I will declare the decree; the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee." Shall the kings of the earth command their birth days to be observed by their subjects, and not the King of Zion? Well might John Bunyan say, "Shall God as with his finger point, and that in the face of the world at this day, saying, 'Thou art my Son, this day,' &c., and shall not Christians fear, and awake from their employments, to worship the Lord on this day? If God remembers it, well may I! If God says and that with all gladness of heart, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee!' may not, ought not, I also to set this day apart to sing the songs of my redemption in? This day my redemption was finished. This day my dear Jesus revived. This day He was declared to be the Son of God with power. 'This day'—after this day was come, God never, that we read of, made mention with delight of the old seventh-day Sabbath more."

3. It is the Resurrection of the Lord of Angels. Hence the day was honored by their adoration. "Again, when He bringeth in the first begotten into the world, (i. e. by raising Him from the dead,) He saith, and let all the angels of God worship him." Heb. i. 7. And shall not men, as well as angels worship him too? "Kiss (i. e. adore) the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way when His wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him." Ps. ii. 12.

4. It is the Resurrection of the Head of the Church. And hence the day consecrated by this glorious event, is given us for our weekly Christian Festival. Ps. cxviii. 24. "Exodus" indeed objects to my interpretation of this passage on two grounds. 1. That a day of Christian worship is not equivalent to a Sabbath. 2. That the text proves only the establishment of a new era of joy, not of a new weekly festival founded on the Messiah's exaltation. As to the first, I will concede to him that a day of devotionl rest, divinely appointed, and of weekly recurrence, is essential to the idea of a Sabbath. And as to the second, I will now try to convince him that such a "day" is really intended in Ps. cxviii. 22—24, by a closer examination of that interesting prophecy.

The passage reads thus: "The Stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner. THIS IS THE DAY which which the Lord hath MADE; we will rejoice and be glad in it." I remark, 1. The sense of Scripture is no more arbitrary than in other books, and therefore the word "DAY" must here have a determinate meaning. 2. This must be its literal meaning, unless sufficient reasons can be given to show the contrary. 3. The literal meaning of word the in question is a period of twenty-four hours; (Gen. i. 5, 8,) and "Exodus" has shown no reasons for giving it here the tropical meaning of era. 4. This Psalm was actually sung on the occasion of our Lord's triumphal entrance into Jerusalem, which was on the first day of the week, (the week in which He died;) and the prophecy was thus applied to that day, with His own most explicit and emphatic sanction. For when some of the Pharisees said unto him, Master rebuke thy disciples, He answered and said unto them, "I tell you that if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out." The passage is quoted six times in reference to Christ. No prophecy then has a more determinate meaning, or fixed application. By the authority of the Lord the day is "made." How "made?" This word can have no distinct meaning, unless it signifies here "made sacred;" and to agree with the foregoing verse, it must mean "made sacred to Christ," in honor of His exaltation as "the head of the corner." And that this sacredness is to be recognized by the Church, is clear from the following words, "We will exult aad be glad in it." It is then made sacred by Divine authority as the distinguishing festival of the Christian Church. But if this new day be established, it follows that the day formerly fixed for the Jews is, by the same authority, now made void. For so the Apostle Paul reasons in a like case, as to the force of Ps. cx. 4; a passage, by the way, whose bearing was before as little understood even by Christians, as the one now under discussion.

It remains therefore, I think, a sound conclusion from the premises, that the first day of the week is appointed the Sabbath of the Christian Dispensation. For, if the passage was originally applied to the day of our Lord's public manifestation as the King of Zion, how much more to the same day of the week, (just one week after this,) when His high claim was forever demonstrated by his triumphant resurrection from the dead? It is worthy of remark, that both Baptism and the Lord's Supper were appointed by our Lord before His death, and confirmed after His resurrection, as perpetual ordinances in His Church. Why not also the distinguishing "stated day" of Christian Worship? Analogy would lead us to expect this. All the facts of the case confirm it. It is the key to all the subsequent history—as I shall hereafter show.

"This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it." Such, with slight exceptions, (according to this prophecy) has been the consenting language of the whole Christian Church, from that day to this. And such, I cannot doubt, it will continue to be, in despite of all "murmurers and complainers" like the Pharisees of that age, so long as the love of a crucified and risen Saviour shall continue to warm the bosoms of redeemed and regenerated men. Not absolutely indeed, (as "Exodus" perversely understands me,) but comparatively, will the wonders of the original creation "cease to be remembered and come into mind." Isaiah lxv. 17, 18.

My friends asks for "decisive authority." What more decisive authority could be desired? Here is the greatest of miracles, and a Divine explanation of its meaning in fixing the "Lord's day." The Resurrection of Christ is the center-point of Christianity. Every thing dear to a Christian's soul is attached to it, and revolves around it. It is the grand unmistakable "sign" of the Divine authority of our Lord. And as sure as He is our Lord, He "is Lord also of the Sabbath day."

HOW TO PREPARE SERMONS.

Dr. Griffin, as is well known, prepared his sermons with great care. He felt the importance of bringing "beaten oil" into the sanctuary. The following incident related of him, by a friend, is both amusing and instructive:—

Dr. G. was once at his house and spent the Sunday. On Sunday morning he went into the study and began to read over his sermon; he called for ink and sand. He began to strike out and pour on the sand. The manuscript was already black with erasures and insertions, but the work went on, the paper growing darker every moment. One of the little children coming up and looking on the blotted and blurred manuscript, corrected and recorrected, said, "How can you read your sermon? It is all scratched out." He was peculiar in covering with ink every word erased, so that it could not be read.

The remark of the child led him to speak of his custom, and, said he, "This I regard as one chief excellence of my preaching, if I have any." He continued, "I have a plain figure which I use in the study; it will not do for the public ear; it serves to illustrate my point. If you put swingling tow upon a hetchel, you can ride to Boston on it; but if you pull out the tow," holding up his fingers to represent the process, "and let the points stick up, they will prick." "So," said he, "you may cover up the truth with ornaments and words, till the conscience cannot be reached. You must pull out the tow"—the points are the truth—"pull out the tow, and let the points stick up." A better illustration was never given. If our sermons had less "tow" and more naked "points," they would do more execution.

TO-MORROW.

"The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself."
Matthew 6: 34.

Let to-morrow take care of to-morrow;
Its cares need not burthen your mind;
What's the use to anticipate sorrow,
Life's trouble's are never behind!
If to hope overmuch be an error,
'T is one that the wise have preferred;
And how often have hearts been in terror
Of evils that never occurred!

Have faith—and thy faith shall sustain thee—
Permit not suspicion and care
With invisible bonds to enchain thee,
But bear what God gives thee to bear.
By his Spirit supported and gladdened,
Be ne'er by "forebodings" deterred;
But think how oft hearts have been saddened
By fear—of what never occurred!

Let to-morrow take care of to-morrow;
Short and dark as our life may appear,
We may make it still darker by sorrow—
Still shorter by folly and fear!
Half our troubles are half our invention;
And often from blessings conferred
Have we shrunk in the wild apprehension
Of evils—that never occurred!

I OUGHT TO PRAY MORE.

For one, I am convinced that I do not pray enough. I feel this conviction daily. As a half-fed man is conscious that he needs more food, so my half-famished soul tells me that I need more prayer. I need it to give me strength, to quicken my languishing graces, to enliven my affections, to vitalize my relations to the church, and to spiritualize all my conversation.

I must pray more. I am in a world of sin; unholy influences are pressing me on every side. The spirit of the world assails me at every step. In all the domestic, social, and business relations of life, I meet it and feel it, and without more prayer, I shall yield to it. Alas, I have yielded; am still yielding, and there is no alternative but more prayer! I must pray more or be swept down by the tide. Lord, save, or I perish!

I will pray more. A good resolution! May I have grace to keep it! How many such have been broken! Let me, then, first of all, pray for grace to do what I see needs to be done. And let me remember that it is prayer that I need, communion with God, intercourse with heaven, fellowship with the Holy Spirit. I need the penitence, humility, self-abasement and self-renunciation which prayer alone can secure. I need the faith, and hope, and love which prayer alone can awaken.

I will pray more, then, because it is my duty to do so. I am morally and spiritually unfit to engage in God's service as I am. I have reason to fear that my offerings may be an abomination to the Lord. But my obligation to serve God remains. I ought to do Christian duty, and bring my gifts to the altar. And God is waiting to be gracious! willing to give his Spirit to those who ask him.

Then I ought, and must, and will pray more for others, for my family, friends, the church, the world, and especially for my pastor! Alas, how have I forgotten him of late. Lord, take not from me thine Holy Spirit! Restore unto me the joys of thy salvation, and uphold me by thy free Spirit. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee. Oh, teach me and help me to pray. My fainting and inconstant heart turns to thee. Oh, strengthen me with strength in my soul.

EVENING PRAYER BEFORE THE SLEEP OF DEATH.

Less than two years since, an esteemed brother in the ministry attended family worship as usual in the evening, and then retired—but died within five minutes afterwards.

Less than two months since, an inestimable sister in our church attended evening worship as usual with her husband, then retired, and within five minutes was struck with death, and passed to her account without another word. Neither of these had any more reason to expect such a sudden summons, than the writer or reader of this has to apprehend a similar one to-night.

"How many fall as sudden—few as safe."

There is not only a Christian propriety, but a sacred beauty, in the fact, that their last conscious act of importance on earth was an act of worship. "Thy will be done!"—and then they dropped into the arms of their Redeemer.

"Thou art our Shepherd and we thy sheep"—and immediately they heard his voice calling them to lie down in green pastures and beside the still waters. What a mistake—what a misfortune for both, had they died without that last prayer!

Criminals condemned to death, sometimes kneel and pray beside their open graves; but how different the untroubled, unconstrained prayer of the Christian at the side of his bed on which he is then to lie down for his long repose.

Missionaries, about to sail for their distant fields of labor, celebrate and hallow their parting with friends and their native land, by an act of worship. So did that brother and sister, without foreseeing the result, commend themselves and were commended by others to God, and then they launched off upon the voyage that was to bear them over dark waters to the Haven of Eternal Rest.

Queen Esther desired the pious Jews to pray for her, ere she went into the presence of Ahasuerus; Jacob wrestled with the angel to the last moment possible, before he ventured to meet his injured and powerful brother Esau; and Stephen prayed until the heavens opened to receive his freed spirit. Now what can be more appropriate than that last act of probation—the finishing stroke of preparation for the presence of the Great King, should be an act of devout homage? Were one to choose for himself, would he not have his last associations with earth connected with such a scene, rather than with any thing frivolous or worldly? Would he not have his last interview with friends on earth remembered as a social religious service? No one is so thoughtless but he would wish to strengthen himself for his long journey, could he foresee his time of starting. No parent would omit evening prayer, if he had reason to think some one of his household would be called home before morning; and how dare any one omit it when he knows that this may be the case?

It would add solemnity and importance to our evening devotions, to remember that, when we commit ourselves and all our precious interests to God's keeping, professing entire confidence in his wisdom and goodness, He may on that very night take us at our word.

DR. NETTLETON'S METHOD WITH INQUIRERS.

A writer in the Richmond Watchman and Observer, has been giving some interesting sketches of that distinguished revivalist, Rev. A. Nettleton, D.D. In one of these sketches we find the following reference to Dr. Nettleton's method of treating with inquirers:—

He observed great caution and discrimination, in conversing with an inquiring sinner. To such, he ordinarily had but little to say, even when they sought his counsel in private. Many a one who in deep distress applied to him for instruction and advice, was dismissed with scarcely a word, lest, I presume, he should in some way give relief that was unauthorized, or seem to encourage dependence on himself, or on creature help, rather than on an immediate surrender of every thing to Christ, and entire acquiescence in him.

On one occasion, a young man in a most distressing state of anxiety, visited him at the Seminary. He found him intently engaged in reading some extracts from Pollock's Course of Time; which had then just appeared in Littell's Religious Magazine. These he continued to read to Mrs. N. and others. He gave the young man no opportunity of personal conversation, though he could not be ignorant of the cause of his visit. On retiring, Mr. N. inquired if he was acquainted with Mr. L., (a young friend of his who had just obtained a comforting hope,) and on receiving an affirmative reply, he merely said, "I wish you would go and see him." The young man was greatly disappointed, though more than ever convinced of the vanity of human help.

A full acquintance with the course of Mr. N. would show what a fund of practical wisdom he had acquired from his long and successful experience in the management of revivals. At another time, the same young man was about to leave a meeting at the "Old Tavern," and when anxiously waiting to press his hand, and perhaps receive from his lips a word specially adapted to his awakened state of feeling, he simply said, on taking his hand, "Don't you love Christ yet?" This was, no doubt, most wisely said, and though his spirit sunk within him at the rebuke it contained, it was, probably, better adapted to his case, than almost any thing else he could have said.

Some weeks after this, the young man called again at the Seminary, where he found Mr. L, (the young convert above named.) Mr. N. was conversing with him in reference to his future plans and purposes in the service of his new Master. He urged the duty of earnest and prayerful inquiry as to the mode in which he was called to serve him, and especially recommended to him the zeal and faith of Samson, that though like him, in darkness and unable to see his way, he might still search for the strongholds of the enemy, and feel for the pillars of his kingdom, (suiting the action to the words,) and in some way be strengthened from on high, to aid in pulling them down.

SMALL FAULTS.

Homes are more often darkened by the continual recurrence of small faults than by the actual presence of any decided vice. These evils are apparently of very dissimilar magnitude; yet it is easier to grapple with the one than the other. The Eastern traveler can combine his forces, and hunt down the tiger that prowls upon his path; but he finds it scarcely possible to escape the musquitoes that infest the air he breathes, or the flies that swarm in the sand he treads. The drunkard has been known to renounce his darling vice, the slave to dress in extravagance her besetting sin; but the waspish temper, the irritating tone, the rude, dogmaticical manner, and the hundred nameless negligences that spoil the beauty of association, have rarely done other than proceed, till the action of disgust and gradual alienation leaving nothing but a barren track, over which the mere skeleton of companionship stalks alone.

JUGGERNAUT'S TEMPLE A CHRISTIN PULPIT.—While the great festival of Juggernaut was held at Dumroi, Bengal, June 23, 1849, a missionary by the name of Bion, and some of his associates, were present with their Christian tracts, which they distributed among the crowd, testifying of Jesus to as many as they could reach. But with this Bion was not satisfied. He wished to speak to the vast multitude, but finding no elevated place, he sprang to the lowest terrace of the idol car. The astonished people crowded thickly around him, and permitted him to speak, without disturbance, salvation through Jesus Christ. "I was never so happy," he writes, "in any pulpit, as upon the car of Juggernaut."

AM I A STEWARD?

If I am a steward, the property of which I have the control does not belong to me. It has been committed to me in trust, to be employed according to the will of its proper owner. His providence has secured its accumulation. It is undoubtedly all his gift, or more properly loan. Has he ever yielded the ownership of it, or given me any warrant for regarding it as my own, to be used only as my own will and desires shall dictate? Never.

If I am a steward of God, then my time, and influence, and talents, all belong to him. They are all to be exercised for his glory, for the promotion of the interests of his kingdom.

A steward! Why, then my relation to God is precisely that which a clerk holds to a merchant, or a servant to his employer. I have no more right than they have to use property and time committed to my trust as though it were my own. Suppose the steward of a rich man were to appropriate the funds entrusted to him, or employ his time and abilities in securing his own selfish interests. I should have not hesitated in pronouncing him dishonest. Trusted funds and responsibilities among men should be very sacredly regarded, and used according to the instruction of the rightful proprietor.

And I am a steward of God! He has promised me a support and liberal payment if I am faithful. He has required me to employ his time and his money in relieving the wants of his poor, in instructing the ignorant in reclaiming the wicked; in a word, in spreading his gospel and in promoting the interests of his kingdom. How am I fulfilling this responsible trust! I am almost afraid to face this question boldly. I felt some reluctance to give to the last call of charity, and I gave grudgingly and sparingly. A short time ago I absolutely declined a contribution when I had some of the Lord's money in my purse; and I believe it would have pleased him to have given it. Am I really acting as if what he has entrusted me with was mine? as if I had a right to dispose of it at my own pleasure? If so, I am robbing God. I am an unfaithful steward. I must repent of this wickedness and fraud, confess it to God, and ask for pardon. And O let me never again forget that I am only a trustee—a steward—holding talents and time, and money, in trust for others.

CIRCULATION OF THE BIBLE.

Dr. Adams, in his article in the Christain Review, retrospecting the last fifty years, says, "ten times aa many Bibles have been printed since 1804, the year when the British and Foreign Bible Society was organized, as ever existed in all previous centuries of the the world together. This statement is not based on loose conjecture. The library of the late Duke of Sussex, containing a copy of nearly every edition of the Bible since the invention of the art of printing, furnished important data in authenticating this calculation. It is computed that from the time of the Reformation to the organization of the British and Foreign Bible Society, (1804,) there were in existence between three and four millions of Bibles, and these in some forty different languages. Since that time, the beginning of organized effort for the spread of the Scriptures, more than thirty millions of Bibles and Testaments have been put in circulation, in more than one hundred and sixty languages; and this in addition to all which has been accomplished by private enterprise. A power-press striking off fifteen hundred copies of the New Testament in a single day, is no trifling thing in this world of ours. The Report of the British and Foreign Bible Society contains an amount of information as to the languages and dialects of the earth, not easily to be obtained from any other source. Fifty years ago, the word of God was translated into languages spoken by about two hundred millions. To-day the same holy book may be read by more than six hundred millions of the earth's population. Is not this result of associated charity of great historical importance? Has it no bearing on the intellect, the liberty, the life, the progress, and the prospects of the world?"

PIETY AND MENTAL GROWTH.—An hour of solitude passed in sincere and earnest prayer, or the conflict with and conquest over a single passion or 'subtile bosom sin,' will teach us more of thought, will more effectually awaken the faculty, and form the habit of reflection, than a year's study in the school without them.

A reflecting mind is not a flower that grows wild, or comes up of its own accord. The difficulty is indeed greater than many who mistake quick recollection for thought, are disposed to admit; but how much less than it would be, had we not been born and bred in a Christian and Protestant land, very few of us are sufficiently aware. Truly may we, and thankfully ought we to exclaim with the Psalmist: "The entrance of thy words giveth light; giveth understanding even to the simple."

ELOQUENCE OF THE HANDS.—The hands are, by the very instincts of humanity, raised in prayer; clasped in affection; wrung in despair; pressed on the forehead, when the soul is "perplexed in the extreme; drawn inward, to invite; thrust forth objectively, to repel. The fingers point to indicate, and are snapped in disdain; the palm is laid upon the heart, in invocation of subdued feeling; and on the brow of the compassioned in benediction. The expressive capacity of the hands was never more strikingly displayed than in the orisons of the deaf and dumb. Their teacher stood with closed eyes, and addressing the Deity by those signs made with the fingers, which constitute a language for the speechless. Around him were grouped more than a hundred mutes, following with reverend glances every motion. It was a visible, but not an audible worship.

The Sabbath Recorder.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

Want of time compelled us to omit our strictures upon "Exodus" last week. If our readers will refer to the article, they will discover that the author endeavors to justify his third proposition, that "Jesus studiously and ostentatiously violated the Sabbath." He argues, that the works of our Lord—his miraculous cures, &c.—which were performed on the Sabbath day, were contrary to the prohibition, "in it thou shalt not do any work," as explained by "adjudged cases, or illustrative exhortations." Having carefully examined the "cases" and "exhortations" which he has quoted, and with them compared the works of Jesus Christ, we must honestly say, that we are not able to see how any indictment against our Lord as a Sabbath-breaker can be fairly sustained. "Exodus," with lawyer-like pertinacity, insists upon the most rigid Pharisaic construction of the prohibition. But we hold that one part of the law is a fair commentary upon the other. The first part requires that, within the first six days of the week, "thou shalt labor and do all THY work." Those who undertake an analysis of the law, should not overlook this little word "thy." It has a more significant import than is generally attached to it. And we gather from it, that one great design of the Sabbath was to oppose a check to the grasping selfishness of man. He is therefore required, in all that business which concerns himself, his pecuniary profits and emoluments, to confine himself to "the six working days." But in regard to work, which directly concerns the glory of God, such as offering sacrifices, (Matt. 12 : 5,) performing the rite of circumcision, (John 7 : 23,) preaching the gospel, healing the sick, carrying to and fro such things as are necessary for the rolief of the distressed, feeding the hungry, &c. &c., the law makes no such requirement. Such things are not "thy work," but God's work. This is a point which the Pharisees overlooked. Hence their premature condemnation of the Saviour. Our friend "Exodus" seems to have overlooked it also. Hence his readiness to charge upon the Saviour a "studious" violation of the Fourth Commandment. It is evident, however, that the prohibition, "thou shalt not do ANY work," is to be construed in accordance with the import of the previous expression, "THY work." Let our friend review the matter in the light of this just construction of the Fourth Commandment, and he will see that his "adjudged cases" and "illustrative exhortations" are not parallel with our Saviour's work.

He has quoted Exod. 16 : 23, 29. But there was not the least necessity for the Israelites to gather manna on the Sabbath day. God had provided a double quantity the day before, and directed that it should then be subjected to such culinary operation as taste or necessity might require. It was not hunger which drove them out to seek for it on the Sabbath; or if it was, it was brought upon them by their own wanton neglect and disobedience. Their going out for it that morning, therefore, was not to do God's work of dealing bread to the hungry, (Isa. 58 : 7, 10,) but to do their own work—to find their own pleasure. It was a selfish thing entirely, in which the glory of God was not concerned. Was the work of Christ, in allowing his disciples to pluck the ears of corn, and eat, a parallel case? By no means. It was, on the contrary, parallel with that case of extreme necessity in which David and his companions demanded the show-bread.

He has quoted Num. 15 : 32. But this was a case, in which, if we may judge from the context, the transgressor had in view neither the glory of God, nor his own necessities. It was a case of presumptuous sinning. Ver. 30.

He has quoted Amos 8 : 5, in which the Sabbath is represented as irksome to a certain class of people, because it opposed a temporary check to their avarice and knavery.

He has quoted Jer. 17 : 20, 21, in which the people of Jerusalem are forbidden to bring in, or carry forth, burdens on the Sabbath day, or to do any work, and are required to hallow the institution agreeably to the commandment given to their fathers; a passage which is well explained by Neh. 13 : 15—19, (which he has also quoted,) as denoting the bearing of such burdens, and the performance of such kinds of labor, as were connected with ordinary wordly business, and promoted their own selfish ends. To say that our Lord violated this precept, when he ordered the poor cripple to carry his krabbaton, (John 5 : 8,) only betrays the miserable shifts of a wretched cause. If carrying a burden, under any pretext whatever, was a violation of the Sabbath, then there never was a time, even when the institution was at the hight of its glory, when good men did not violate it. For to lift a sheep or an ox out of a pit, into which it had fallen, was always a duty Matt. 12 : 11. But did anybody ever think that such an act of humanity indicated a "studious" denial of the sanctity of the Sabbath? Certainly not. Why then does the mere fact of authorizing a healed cripple to carry a burden, indicate that our Lord denied it? The fact is, that the act of carrying a burden, though it were of the weight of an ox, was never a violation of the Sabbath, unless it was done in the way of carrying on one's own business. And labor, when done for the sake of directly promoting the worship of God, (as the labor of the priests in the temple,) or in the way of directly showing forth his glory, was always in strict keeping with he sanctity of the Sabbatic rest. As the act of the healed cripple carrying his bed, was an act in which he gave a direct and ocular demonstration of the power of Jesus Christ to all the people, it was as suitable work for the Sabbath as preaching the gospel would have been.

Now if these "adjudged cases" are to be relied upon as "an authoritative and final decision as to the requirements oi the Fourth Commandment"—and we cheerfully admit that they are—our Saviour was guiltless of any violation. For though "by word, and by deed, he solemnly proclaimed 'I WORK,'" it was in every instance, nevertheless, work which directly manifested the glory of God. And if the most of his miraculous cures were performed on the Sabbath, they were not so done for the sake of weaning the Jewish veneration of the institution, and of practically denying its sanctity, as "Exodus" intimates, but for the purpose of vindicating it from Pharisaic austerity.

But, says "Exodus," "His very claim of being Lord of the Sabbath, fully establishes the fact of its violation. How could he exercise 'lordship' over the institution, except by resisting its control? If his authority were his vindication, it certainly could not have been a vindication of his obedience to the law." But no one pretends it to have been a vindication of his obedience. It was a vindication of his right to use the Sabbath for other purposes than the Pharisees in their blindness considered lawful. A false rigidness with regard to the Sabbath pervaded the entire Jewish community. The Saviour undertook to correct that rigidness, and consequently exposed himself to a misrepresentation of his conduct. This led him to vindicate what he did, and speak of himself as Lord of the Sabbath. He exercised his 'lordship' over it, not "by resisting its [lawful] control," but by resisting any and every attempt to make him observe it in accordance with Pharisaic custom. In this he did nothing more than what every good man had a right to do, with this important difference, however, that good men may somtimes err in judgment as to what is lawful to be done on the Sabbath, and therefore may exercise their 'lordship' over it in a way that they ought not to. But Jesus Christ could not so err. He was therefore "Lord of the Sabbath" in an infinitely higher degree than any mere man. He was Lord of it absolutely, his judgment concerning what was lawful to be done during its sacred hours, and what was unlawful, being infallible. It is nevertheless important, to a right view of this much perverted passage, to consider that every man is lord of the Sabbath to a certain extent. As it was made for him, and not he for it, he may exercise a lordship over it so far as to determine, in the fear of God, what would be a violation of its sanctity, and what would not. And it ought to be distinctly noted, that it was on this ground alone, (viz: the subordination of the Sabbath to man,) that the Son of man claimed to be Lord of the institution. His argument to his accusers was substantially this:—"The very fact that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath; proves that every man is so far lord of the institution, that he may determine for himself, in trying cases, what is lawful to be done on that day and what not. Of this authority, David and his companions, availed themselves in a certain case of emergency. THEREFORE, from this very principle,—the principle of the Sabbath's subordination to man—it follows that the Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath. Mark 2 : 27, 28. For if every man is lord of it in cases of extreme emergency, notwithstanding his liability to err in judgment, much more is the Son of man Lord of it, who is infinite in wisdom, and cannot err."

A word now in reference to the rejoinder of "J. N. B." to his opponent, a portion of which we publish this week.

The demand which he makes of "Exodus" to "come out clearly and show his colors"—to tell "what he means to do with the Decalogue"—is one which we should like to see complied with. It is an easy thing to suggest doubts concerning the moral nature of the Sabbatic institution; plausible evidence of its positive character may be found without much difficulty; and the absence of an express command to observe it from the New Testament, may be used to create a doubt of its binding obligation; but the reason of its incorporation into the Decalogue with nine other precepts confessedly moral, has never yet been satisfactorily explained by the advocates of anti-sabbatarianism. We do wish they would enlighten us on this point.

If the Decalogue is a summary of the Moral Law—an everlasting rule of righteousness—proof of its re-enactment by Christ in explicit terms is not needed. Indeed the very notion of re-enactment is inadmissible, for the reason that it could not have expired. It would be binding, though not one of its precepts were explicitly enjoined in the New Testament. But a demand of "an explicit account of the transfer of the Sabbath to the first day, from the seventh of the Jewish calendar week," is not quite so "preposterous and presumptous" as "J. N. B." seems to imagine. The reader will observe that on this point he waxes warm, as if he felt the weakness of the position he had undertaken to maintain. Better keep cool, however. Those who make the demand, do not "dictate to God the mode of his revelation." They only ask for proof that He has made any such revelation. They have never seen any such thing in the record; and the present attempt of "J. N. B." to show it, is only another instance of the readiness with which some men make imagination supply the place of evidence. Dear brother, we assure you that we still fail to see it; and, in all friendship, we suggest that one single "Thus saith the Lord," would spare you the necessity of weaving such a lengthy and fine-spun argument from the resurrection of Christ, which to plain unlettered people, who must answer for themselves to God, is utterly incomprehensible after all. To us it appears very much like the attempt of a Pedobaptist to find infant baptism in the Abrahamic covenant.

On the whole, we think we cannot furnish a more complete refutation of this whole argument founded upon the 118th Psalm, than by giving an extract from a valuable little tract lying before us. And with this we close our remarks upon the discussion.

"Psalm 118 : 22, 24—'The stone which the builders refused is become the head-stone of the corner.' 'This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it.'

"Acts 4 : 10, 11—'Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole. This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner.'

"You premise, that 'the day which the Lord hath made' is the day of the resurrection of Christ. Whence you infer, that the first day of of the week is the Sabbath.

"1. If what you premise were true, the inference does not follow. The prophet does not say, We will rejoice and be glad in the same day of every week; but, We will rejoice and be glad in it, that is, in that day, whatever it may be. Now Christ did not rise on the first day of every week, but on one single day; and we may very well rejoice and be glad in that one day, without keeping any Sabbath in connection with it. Abraham rejoiced and was glad in the day of Christ; but he kept no Sabbath in honor of it. So, doubtless, you rejoice and are glad in the day of his crucifixion, though you do not celebrate it on any particular day of the week. But—

"2. You are evidently mistaken in referring this language of the Psalmist to the resurrection of Christ—for the following reasons:—

"First—Because 'the day which the Lord hath made' is the same in which Christ went in by the gates of rightousness. Verses 19 and 20. 'Open to me the gates of righteousness; I will go into them, and I will praise the Lord. This gate of the Lord, into which the righteous shall enter.' Now, though Christ did come up from 'the gates of death' on the day of his resurrection, he did not formally 'enter' by 'the gates of righteousness,' till that day when he ascended from Mount Olivet, which was not the first day of the week. His almighty power and eternal Sonship were declared most gloriously on the day of his resurrection; but it was on the day of his ascension that his mediatorial righteousness was formally approved by the Father; while it was visibly manifested, in the presence of the universe, that the door of heaven had been opened to all true believers. Then shouted the seraphim, and all the host of heaven, while the door-posts of the New Jerusalem trembled at the voice, 'Arise, O Jehovah, into thy rest, thou, and the ark of thy strength. Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness; and let thy saints shout for joy!' Therefore, this is not the day of Christ's resurrection, but that of his ascension.

"Second—Because 'the day which the Lord hath made' is the same in which 'the stone which the builders refused' became 'the head-stone of the corner,' (verse 22.) Christ did not become the 'the head of the corner,' till he 'sat down on the right hand of God.' You assert that he did, and refer to Acts 4 : 10, 11, quoted above as proof. From what the Apostle there sets forth, you draw the inference, that as he was set at naught by the builders, when he was crucified, so he became the head of the corner, when God raised him from the dead. The Apostle does not say, however, that this took place on the same day that he rose from the dead; and all that we must necessarily infer from what he does say, is that he became the head of the corner since his resurrection, which is cheerfully admitted. But whether it was on the same day, or two, or ten, or forty days after, the Apostle saith not. Still your inference would be entirely natural and proper, if it were not contrary to the analogy of faith, and to the teachings of the same spirit in other parts of the Scriptures.

"I suppose it will be admitted, that when he first became the head of the corner, he became 'the head over all things to the church,' and that then 'all things were put under his feet.' Now the Apostle clearly teaches, that these things took place when he sat down on the right hand of God, as appears from the following texts:—

"Ephesians 1 : 20—22—'Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, (or, having raised him from the dead,) and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be head over all things to the church.'

"Hebrews 2 : 8, 9—'But now we see not yet all things put under him (man;) but we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor.' Observe, that the Apostle's great object in this epistle is, to show that Christ is in heaven, forever interceding for the church.

"Now, is it not manifest from these texts, that Christ became the head of the corner when he ascended to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God? Nor is there any thing in Acts 4 : 10, 11, that contradicts this idea.

"Brethren, the glorious building of grace has its foundation, not on earth, where we are pilgrims and strangers, but in heaven, where Jesus, the corner-stone, 'elect and precious,' sitteth at the right hand of God, and is constantly occupied in gathering from afar the 'lively stones' of the glorious edifice. Blessed forever be his holy name!"

ANALOGICAL AND INFERENTIAL ARGUMENT.

We do not exchange with the Baptist Record, but as we find the following in the columns of the Christian Secretary, we suppose that paper considers it among the things that are unanswerable:—

To the argument in favor of a change of the day of the Sabbath under the Christian dispensation, it is sometimes objected that it is partly analogical, and that analogy is an unsafe mode of proof. I answer that its value depends entirely upon the perfection of the analogy. Some analogies are extremely imperfect, and as grounds of reasoning, untenable as air. Others are clear and strong as adamant. Some like shallow rivers, glitter and pass without moving us; but others, like flood tides, carry along our convictions in their deep and silent stream. Analogy is the basis of probability, and as Bishop Butler justly observes, "probability is the guide of life." Nothing, indeed, is more effectual in removing objections.

It may be said, however, "when Old Testament analogies and inferences are urged in favor of Infant Baptism we reject them; and shall we then receive them as valid in the case of the Sabbath? Give us a positive command in the New Testament, and we submit immediately. A Sabbath can only be established by an explicit and authoritative command." Who disputes it? The only question before us is about the change of the day. Circumstances may be such as to make an explicit declaration of such a change inexpedient, at least for a time. Yet in other ways the will of God may be sufficiently indicated to His servants. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him." "The wise shall understand; but the wicked shall not understand." Some things of great moment were "spoken in parables to them that were without, but made plain to those within." A change in the DAY of the Sabbath would be very apt to fall under these conditions. Then argument, from the nature of the case would be in point. Then the voice of the pure heart should be heard and considered. Then probabilities are precious in the absence of clearer proofs. Thus the way for clearer proofs is prepared. And thus, too, the spirits of men are tried.

The reason why we reject analogies and inferences in the case of Infant Baptism is, that it is a question of positive law—that there never was at any time such an institution established of God—that the particular analogies and inferences pleaded, are unsound and inconsequential—and that their whole tendency, if admitted, is to set aside, by man's vain tradition, the plain and positive commands of Christ.

Baptists do not reject adalogies in moral reasoning, nor inferences either, provided they legitimately flow from the premises, and harmonize with the grand object of the New Testament economy. No greater masters of reason have ever lived than are found in their ranks, from Roger Williams to Alexander Carson, "the Jonathan Edwards of the nineteenth century." Milton, Bunyan, Vane, Delaune, Fuller, Hall, and Foster, are among them. [Bapt. Rec.

Remarks.

The notion that the Sabbatic institution is one thing, and the particular day on which it is observed quite another, which runs through the foregoing, has so long obtained currency, that it seems next to impossible to obtain a hearing for any argument that tends to show its fallacy. We have exposed the fallaciousness of it, over and over; yet, without any attempt at reply, our opponents continue to reiterate it with as much bold assurance as if its orthodoxy had never been called in question. Again we ask, Do the Scriptures recognize any such distinction? Do they ever speak of the Sabbath as one thing, and of the day of the Sabbath as another? When the Sabbath was first instituted, it was done by putting the Divine blessing upon a particular day. "God blessed the seventh DAY." Gen. 2 : 3. And but for the fact that the day was "blessed" and "sanctified," there had been no such thing as a Sabbatic institution. And in the Fourth Commandment, the only thing which the Israelites are required to "remember," and "keep holy," is the day of the rest. The day in which Jehovah himself rested—which, as every one knows, was the last day of the week—is the only object, direct or indirect, of this command. And therefore, if this precept stands unrepealed, there is no principle of logic which will justify the notion, that some other day may be made to engross all the authority of the command. A commandment enjoining, directly and unequivocally, the seventh day of the week, never can be made to enjoin the observance of the first. It is perfectly astonishing to us that men, otherwise possessed of discernment, should be so blind to a point as clear as this is. Language could not make it plainer.

The reason why the Baptist "rejects analogies and inferences in the case of Infant Baptism," is the very reason why we reject them in the case of the Sabbath, viz:—"that it is a question of positive law—that there never was at any time such an institution established of God" as the First day or Sunday Sabbath—"that the particular analogies and inferences pleaded, are unsound and inconsequential—and that their whole tendency, if admitted, is to set aside, by man's vain tradition, the plain and positive commands of God."

We do not wonder that, "in the absence of proof, probabilities are precious" to those who have some misgivings concerning the foundntion which the Sunday observance rests upon. We have always known that they were very "precious" to our First-day friends. We have always known, too, that they considered themselves as being of the number of "the wise," to whom it is given to "understand" all about this doctrine of a change of the day, and that they viewed those who were skeptical on this point as being not many degrees removed from the ignorant "wicked." But we never before heard the prophecy of Daniel quoted to this effect. We live to learn, however. That among "those things of great moment," which were "spoken in parables to them that were without, but made plain to those within," the change of the Sabbath was one, is about as true as that Infant Baptism was another. The idea, however, is not exactly new to us. If we recollect rightly, Mr. Parkinson once hinted such an idea in his discussion with Elder Maxson. How forlorn must that cause be, which is obliged to avail itself of such arguments!

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 39.

GLASGOW, May 23d, 1851.

The Church and State Gazette says that decisive steps are now in contemplation to prevent Dr. Pussey from continuing to corrupt the doctrine of the Church of England. This may, however, be found a less easy task than is supposed. The relationship between the Church and the State in this country is maintained by a very complicated system of law—relying upon which the notorious Bishop of Exeter, notwithstanding the decision in the Gorham case, has refused to license, as curate, a Mr. Codnor, on the same grounds as he formerly maintained, and had decided against him. Indeed, this man seems determined either to make the State wholly subservient to the Bishops, or to provoke an open rupture with the Government, and to necessitate a separation between the two great parties into which the Episcopal Church is divided. The efficacy of the sacraments rather than the external forms in his great theme. The inherent efficacy of infant baptism, when rightly administered by men enjoying the benefit of undoubted apostolical succession, and the grace received in the Lord's Supper, similarly administered, are with him the all of Christianity. He accordingly charges heresy in the most decided manner on all who disavow these views, which form the proposed subject of the Synodal convocation he has convened. The legality of this Synod was doubted; and, in the House of Commons a question on the subject by Mr. Childers, led Lord John Russell to state that the law officers of the crown were of opinion that the Bishop had kept within the limits of the law. A Provincial Synod can only be called by a Royal writ, but a Diocesan Synod can be called without it. But although the Bishop does not intend that he and his clergy shall enact canons or ordinances binding on the whole church, yet the Prime Minister added that the term "Synod" in the Bishop's sense is unknown to the law of the land. It is not, however, clear that such a Synod may not be held; and, if so, it is probable that the decisions of any party, of which Henry of Exeter is the head, will be unfavorable to the interests of true godliness.

The University of Oxford, dreading the result of the inquiry of the Commissioners appointed to ascertain what can be done for its improvement obtained an opinion of Counsel that the Commission itself is illegal. Fortified in their opposition by this opinion they refused to answer inquiries addressed to them relative to their affairs. The law officers of the crown having however given an opposite opinion, the University have now petitioned her Majesty to relieve them from the unwelcome visitors. In this they are not likely to prove successful. There is a general feeling of dissatisfaction at the condition of the Educational Institutions both of England and Scotland; the Dissenters, who in both are numerous, being excluded from equal-privileges by the preference given to those avowing the principles of the Establishments, respectively. A Bill has accordingly been introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Cowan, one of the M. P.'s for Edinburgh and an office-bearer in the Free Church, for the abolition of subscription Tests for the lay chairs of the Scottish Universities. The tests referred to are a profession of the faith of the Church of Scotland, required to be taken by the Professors in all departments. It is proposed to require this hereafter only from the Theological Professors. The second reading of the Bill is fixed for the 25th of June; and as the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland began its annual meeting yesterday, this proposal is likely to be denounced severely.

Another disliked measure, which the Assembly will likely discuss with interest, is Lord Melgund's Bill now before Parliament relative to the Parochial Schools of Scotland. It is very unpalatable to the Established clergy, as proposing to remove the obligation which now exists that the parochial teachers shall belong to the Established Church or subscribe any religious test. Dr. Craik, speaking on this subject last week in the Glasgow Presbytery, said "he considered it one of the greatest blessings the country enjoyed, that the Confession of Faith had been ratified by Act of Parliament, and, let persons say what they might, that the Church of Scotland had not the power to alter a single word of that Confession of Faith." It is true that at present the Established Church has no power of making her Confession more in accordance with the Word of God. So long, then, as she exists in this condition, she must stand in the way of return by her ministers and people to the Sabbath of the Lord, and in the way of all reform of the errors which are embalmed in a Confession adopted upwards of 200 years ago.

My space and time afford me no opportunity of chronicling the proceedings of the Annual London Religious meetings. In two of these, however, the readers of the Sabbath Recorder have more interest than in some others. The miscalled Lord's Day Observance Society has during the year expended two hundred pounds more than its receipts—in building hay, wood, straw, and stubble; and the Congregational Union have determined to refuse fellowship to Christians countenancing slavery. J. A. BEGG.

WHY I EMBRACED THE SABBATH.

Some ten years ago, before I made a profession of religion, a young friend, (now a first-day Baptist minister,) and myself commenced examining the time for keeping the Sabbath. After a very short examination, we concluded that a seventh part of time was the spirit of the commandment, and all that it required. With this idea I was satisfied, and thought no more about the subject until my father had become a member of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination. He then gave me some books on the subject, which I read and conversed about with a number of my friends. Inducements of a worldly character were held out to me, but my answer was, that all the wealth of the United States should not persuade me to keep the seventh day unless I was convinced that it was the only right Sabbath. I kept on studying the subject, however, at different times, for some three or four years, and finally became fully convinced that the seventh day was the only true Sabbath. And why?

1st. Because God rested on that day, and sanctified and blessed it.

2d. Because God distinctly commands us to keep the seventh day; and never in a single instance does he say any thing about keeping a seventh day.

3d. Because I can find no other than human authority for the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day.

One thing which disconcerted me much, was, to find that every first day man had his own way of getting round the claims of the seventh day. One would tell me, that it made no difference what day we kept, if it was only a seventh part of the time. Another would say that we ought to keep the first day of the week as the Sabbath in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ. Another told me that the Sabbath was abrogated with the Jewish dispensation, and that we were not required to observe any day as the Sabbath, but only to have stated times to meet for the worship of God. Another said that as God had directed Solomon to build the door of the temple in the east—that this people might not be like the heathen, who had the doors of their temples in the west, that they might enter with their face towards the rising of the sun—so he thought that Christians should observe some other day than the seventh, that there might be a difference between them and the Jews; and he thought it very proper to observe the first day, in commemoration of Christ's resurrection. Other theories I have heard advanced, but, like the foregoing, they all amount to this one thing: We keep Sunday because it is convenient and fashionable!

I will close this letter by relating a little incident which happened a few weeks since. On Sixth-day afternoon, two young men were speaking to me about being so particular as never to work after sunset on Sixth-day evening. Finally they saw Judge S. coming to the office, and agreed to get him to decide for them when the Sabbath commenced. Mr. S. is a well-informed man, but not a professor of religion. As soon as he entered the door, one of the young men said, "Mr. S., when does Sunday commence?" "No, no," cried the other; "when does the Sabbath commence?" "I'll tell you," said he. "The Sabbath, undoubtedly, commences to-night at sunset; but if you mean Sunday, that does not commence until to-morrow night at 12 o'clock. The first day of the week, which we call Sunday, never was observed in the place of the Sabbath until the year 320. And you," said he, turning to me, "will remember that Constantine the Great, when he issued his edict for observing the first day instead of the seventh, inserted a clause something like this, 'We will not call it the Sabbath, but the Lord's Day, that there may be a difference between us and the Jews.' And it never was called the Sabbath until within a few years past." I do not recollect that particular sentence, but I do remember that nearly every history which I have read on the subject, states that the first day of the week never was kept as the Sabbath until about that time, and then by Constantine's orders. I know, also, that there are persons who observe that day conscientiously, and yet maintain the doctrine that it should be called the Lord's Day and not the Sabbath.

From these, and many other considerations which might be brought forward, I can not come to any other conclusion, than that the seventh day of the week is the only true Sabbath. Yours, &c., ALPHA BETA.

☞ We have received Nos. 1 and 2 of the sixth volume of the Ladies' Wreath, edited by Helen Irving. The articles generally have a religious and moral tone, conveying important lessons in relation to the formation of the female character. The embellishments—a steel engraving, flower plate, and a piece of music—are well got up. The typographical execution is good. Altogether it is a work which, for elegance and cheapness, we can recommend to our readers." For further particulars see advertisement in another column."

CHURCH CONSTITUTED.

By a letter from Bro. L. M. Cottrell we learn that a new Seventh-day Baptist Church has been organized, the constituents being, for the most part, those members of the Church in Clarence, Erie Co., N. Y., who were resident in Darien, Cowlesville, and vicinity. All the usual preliminary steps having been taken, thirty-four persons covenanted together, and were constituted into an independent body under the name of the Darien and Cowlesville Church. Eight of this number had been previously baptized by Bro. N. V. Hull, three of whom were formerly observers of the first day of the week. The day following the organization, a discourse was preached by Eld. L. Andrus, after which the Lord's Supper was administered. We do not learn from the communication when the ceremony took place, nor what was the order of exercises, nor who participated in them. But we are informed that it was a very refreshing season, one which caused those who enjoyed it to say, "Blessed be the Lord who has again revived us, and made his face to shine upon us. We will be glad, and rejoice in him." May the blessing of Heaven rest upon this newly organized band.

PRACTICAL READINGS.

An humble minister of the gospel was once preaching in a large city with evident tokens of success. Crowds attended his meetings; young and old, high and low, flocked to hear the word; the Spirit was poured out, and men eminent in wickedness came trembling and professing repentance. Great joy filled the hearts of God's people. Their eyes had never seen, or but once seen such displays of almighty love. It seemed as if the whole city was going to be converted, when S——, a noted ringleader of Satan's host, fell under "the mighty power of God," and joined the multitude of them that believed. Eminent divines, in distant cities, hearing of the blessed work, sent deputies of their number, to see what great things God had wrought, and to lend their fellow servant a helping hand. These brethren took hold, heart and soul, and the good work went on. Young converts were confirmed in the faith; hypocrites, unmasked; opposers, silenced; believers, filled with the Holy Ghost; and the grace of God was magnified. Such were the glad tidings borne back by the delegates to their brethren.

From this harvest field of rich spiritual joy and abundant usefulness, it was hard to withdraw. Yet God called his servant away. It was a dark, mysterious command—and many a Jonah would have fled to Tarshish. "What! must I leave this people, so devoted to me; these lambs, so helpless and tender; this harvest all ripe, and yet half-gathered? May I not stay to eat the fruit of my own vineyard? Then again, this journey I am to undertake is toilsome, if not perilous. And I see no good of it. How am I to live in the desert? And if I could to what purpose? Who is there for me to preach to? My views of duty require me to remain here, where I am so manifestly useful."

Whether sloth or self-seeking raised any such thoughts in this case, I know not. I know, however, that this self-denying minister in obedience to the divine will, clearly manifest, tore himself away from a people who loved him as their spiritual father; from a scene of glorious revival, and a most important field of labor, to enter a journey of which he could foresee neither the end, nor the import; a journey fraught with toil, and hardship, if not danger; and which no doubt, in the eyes of "sober-minded" people looked little better than a fool's errand.

To know all the reasons of any divine procedure, we must be omniscient. Some we may know; others we may reverently inquire. In the present instance, the Lord of the harvest may have seen that his servant was overtasked, and needed change of scene; or his spirituality was in danger from the self-applause and the world applause that ever attend success; that his soul's health demanded a cessation from public labor awhile, and opportunities for prayer and meditation, such as a solitary journey would best afford. Many a diligent laborer in God's vineyard has sighed to himself, "mine own vineyard have I not kept."

But the main reason for this journey, as the result showed was the instruction and establishment in the faith of a distinguished but humble inquirer after truth, who was returning home from the capital of the religious world, unenlightened as he went. In the deserts of Gaza, he comes into the full beaming of gospel light—learns the great mystery, "Christ and him crucified," from the lips of a poor solitary traveler—a pilgrim of the desert, who now first apprehends the object of his wandering thither—professes joyfully his new-born faith, in that solitude, with God and angels alone for witnesses. His mission thus accomplished, Philip is "caught away by the Spirit," and is "found at the Azotus," while the wondering Ethiopian pursues his homeward way rejoicing.

Several things I note in this remarkable passage.

1st. It is sometimes a minister's duty to leave a field of high promise, and go into another much less inviting.

2d. God thinks it worth while to send a servant a hundred miles out of the way, to guide and comfort one sincere inquirer.

3d. He often chooses the most unlikely means to effect his ends. The Eunuch had been in Jerusalem, where were Peter, James, and John, and other apostles. It was much more probable, humanly speaking, that he should receive the gospel at their lips, than that a man of less note, preaching in a place many miles distant, should be sent away from his people at a most interesting moment, on a long and fatiguing journey, just for the conversion of this man. It seems to us the object might have been effected in Jerusalem, with much less trouble, and with more eclat. We would have had him baptized in in the temple by the "very chiefest apostle" and published his name to the world, after the example of some modern newspapers, as an illustrious instance of the grace of God. Is there not something significant in these two facts? God sends a special messenger a long way, into the wilderness, for the salvation of an eminent statesman. He, receiving the truth as a little child, enters the visible church, by the door of baptism, in the most quiet and simple way, without summoning even a witness to his profession.

4th. May I not excuse myself from personal effort for a sinner's salvation because more likely means have failed? He may have heard a "son of thunder" unmoved; or gnashed his teeth while Peter charged home his guilt; and yet it may be in the purpose of God to save him by a simple word of private instruction.

5th. The grand truth, owned of God to the conversion of men, is ever the same; "Jesus Christ and Him crucified." It was this Philip preached, and the Ethiopian received; it is on this all men eminent for success in winning souls, have most delighted to dwell.

And this vital truth, if it would "grow in grace" and "go on unto perfection" must be the daily food of my soul. A.

European News.

During the past week the steamers Asia and Pacific have arrived, bringing London and Liverpool dates to May 28. We give the following as the most important items of intelligence:—

In England, on the 26th ult., the Great Exhibition was opened at the shilling charge, but fear of a crush prevented one. The number of admissions during the day was only about 22,000. On the 27th, the same cause produced the same effect, the number of persons admitted being under 30,000. Forty thousand, or thereabouts, had visited the Crystal Palace in one day while the five shilling rule was in force. There had been more conversation in Parliament about the Papal Aggression Bill, but no result is yet attained. The University of Oxford has protested against the legality of the Commission of Inquiry, which has been in session for eight months and was just ready to report it.

The French President has reviewed 12,000 men upon the Champ de Mars. The cry vive Napoleon was general and enthusiastic. Petitions continue to be presented for the revision of the Constitution. The Legitimists, heeded by MM. Berryer and De Falloux, have determined to support a motion for revision, and, at the same time, to oppose the re-election of Louis Napoleon. In the Departments the petitionary movement takes a more decided color, and pronounces directly either in favor of the prolongation of the President's powers, or the restoration of the legitimate monarchy. The moderate Republicans have prepared a manifesto setting forth their reasons for opposing the revision of the Constitution.

Accounts from Madrid are of the 17th inst. The elections were terminated, and their result was mostly every where favorable to the Cabinet. Three hundred and twenty-four deputies had been elected. Of those 47 are Progresistas, 49 of the Moderate Opposition, 19 of the Conservative Opposition, 8 Legitimists, 50 Independent Moderates, and 151 decided Ministerialists, of whom two-thirds are public functionaries.

The Italian peninsula is very uneasy. There are the same symptoms that always precede outbreaks. We read in a letter of the Times from Rome, that on Sunday some trifling disputes took place in the wine shops of the Transtevere, between some French soldiers and the people. On this occasion Gen. Gémeau issued a decree, which prescribes, under the severest penalties, a general disarmament, and suppresses all licenses to carry arms. From that day all canes and sticks disappeared from the streets of the Eternal City.

The Cabinet at Vienna, in compliance with the reiterated requests of England, has at length consented to set at liberty Kossuth and the other refugees, on the express condition, however, that they shall immediately leave Europe, and engage not to return without the formal consent of the Austrian Government. There has been a great flood at Vienna in consequence of the rains. All the bridges were carried away; but there was no loss of life. The Governments of Austria and Prussia were still at variance with Denmark on the Holstein question.

Dates from Constantinople are to the 4th of May. A misunderstanding is said to have arisen between the Porte and the Servian Goverment. The Porte asserts that the insurrection in Turkish Croatia has been aided and abetted by Servia.

The Plymouth Journal says, "The Bishop of Exeter and Dr. Pussey have lately been made the subjects of special prayers at the Roman Catholic Chapel, Stonehouse, as well as other chapels. Their accession to Rome is doubtless calculated upon as an event not far off."

The vagrants sent to Galway Jail are washed every day, which is inflicted as a great punishment.

The booksellers of London have unanimously agreed to give each of their assistants a holiday and the necessary expenses to enable them to view the Great Exhibition.

FURTHER NEWS FROM NEW MEXICO.—The treaty, consummated at Santa Fé on the 3d of April, between Gov. Calhoun and Col. Monroe, on the part of our Government at Chacon, the head Chief, and Guero Lobez, and Jocesito, Captains of the Apaches, living east of the Rio Grande, has already been signally violated. Toward the close of the last month a descent was made upon Fort Barclay, and all the stock belonging to the settlement was run off. Nearly at the same time, an attack was made upon the village of Moro, and three of the inhabitants killed. The Jicarillas, at the time our party passed San Miguel, (the 2d of May,) were concentrating in large numbers to that vicinity. The breaking up of the old party lines, consequent upon the organization of the Territorial government, has occasioned a complete traversie in New Mexican politics. The old partizans are at work, however, blindly, in the Legislative and Congressional canvass, each doing his best at rehearsal, without knowing exactly what part has been assigned to him. Capt. Reynolds and Major Weightman are the candidates for the office of Delegate to Congress. A new press to be devoted to the present campaign, in the interests of Major Weightman, has been ordered from this town, and is now, most likely, on its way across the Plains.

Later from California.

From California papers, brought last week by the steamer North America, we collect the following items:—

The Legislature adjourned on the last day of April, after a session of four months; but a quorum was left in the Senate on the day of adjournment. The Legislature has passed an act to exempt homesteads and other property from forced sale in certain cases. It has also passed a Usury Law bill fixing interest at 10 per cent., and allowing by special agreement, 18 per cent. per annum.

Business has revived considerably, and the confidence of citizens in the future progress of the State is unabated.

Considerable progress has been made by the Commissioners in forming treaties with the Indians, though they still continue their depredations in the vicinity of Los Angelos.

Some rumors have been afloat that a secret expedition has started from San Francisco for the purpose of taking possession of Lowor California. But it is probably merely rumor.

The prospects of good crops are favorable, the spring rains having been of inestimable value to farmers and gardeners.

There has been much snow in the mountains, and several persons are reported to have lost their lives by being frozen to death.

Accounts from the mining interest represent the late rains as having been most beneficial. The dry diggings have been more alive with the music of the various kinds of cradles, toms, &c.

Lynch law is very prevalent in all parts of California.

The papers give full accounts of "big lumps" found at various diggings; but such stories have become rather stale, without something more substantial.

News from China.

The Overland Friend of China, March 30, gives the following in its summary of intelligence:

The intelligence from the disturbed districts, as received during the months has been of a vague and conflicting nature. At one time we had reports of distinguished success on the part of the Imperialists, at another that similar fortune remained with the insurgents. From the Chinese Repository of February, we learn that—

"The insurgents are believed to possess most of the southern departments in Kwangsi, making Sinchau-fu their headquarters, and have raised their Chief to the imperial dignity under the title of Tienteh, or Heaven's Virtue. They levy a revenue from the general commerce on the Pearl River, from Wu-chau-fu westward, and have crippled the operations of the Imperialists to a very serious degree."

Chan-Tien-tsioh, formerly Governor-General of the two lake provinces has been appointed Fu-yuen, in place of Ching, the degraded Governor. It was this functionary who was once removed from office for his excessive cruelty; he, in order to cure those he governed of the habit of opium smoking, having practised upon a good many the cutting off the lower lip, and so effectually prevented the use of the lethargic pipe.

On the 14th of March as many as thirty-six individuals were decapitated at Canton.

Two American gentlemen, Messrs. Cunningham, and Manigault, on the morning of the 3d of March, started with a Chinese guide, on an excursion to the White Cloud mountain, distant some half a dozen miles from Canton. They were returning in their chairs, and, when about half way home in a lonely place, were set upon by about a dozen miscreants, who, after beating and severely wounding, robbed them of their watches, valuables, and outer garments. Resistance was perfectly futile, nor had they anything excepting umbrellas with which to defend themselves.

SLAVE CASE IN CLEVELAND.—Miss Minor, a resident of Louisiana, is traveling east, accompanied by her slave Mary. While in Cleveland, last week, a writ of habeas corpus was granted by Judge Atkins, directing her to show cause why she detained or restrained the liberty of her servant. She refused to appear or answer, and the Court discharged Mary, saying she was at liberty to go where she pleased. The servant said she had been kindly treated, and returned to her mistress. This did not please the colored people, who were determined to force her freedom upon her, whether she was willing or not, and for that purpose caught hold of her clothing as she went on board the boat. An officer interposed, and she was permitted to accompany her mistress withont further molestation. Miss Minor, it is said, is willing to free her servant whenever the latter chooses to leave her.

FRESHET AT THE WEST.—The Galena (Ill.,) Advertiser of the 26th ult., says: More rain has fallen during the past week than in the same length of time for many years. Small creeks have suddenly become large rivers. Many mills which we have heard of have suffered damage; among others, that of Capt. Gear, at Tete des Morts, had the dam carried off. It is probable that the mills in the pineries above been have tried again, though we have had no such information. The rain has been accompanied by vivid lightnings and crashing thunder. It has struck several times in the vicinty, but we have heard of no material injury done.

James Brisbane, the father of the notorious advocate of Fourierism, died a few days ago at Batavia, N. Y., of which place he was emphatically the oldest inhabitant. He was nearly 78 years of age. The Spirit of the Times, of that village, says that he had been through life singularly free from sickness of any kind, and on the day but one before his decease, was attending to his usual avocations. His malady was an inflammatory affection of the viscera.

Recently, a child in New Bedford, Mass., aged three years, was playing in a garett, and crept through a seven-by-nine pane in the sky-light, in which the glass was broken, and fell from the roof, a distance of twenty-five feet, upon an arbor, attached to the house, the slats of which were broken. The child came to the ground senseless. Drs. Sweet and Wilder were immediately called, who found that the child had, singular to say, received no serious injury, and it is now doing well.

SUMMARY.

Not long since the inhabitants of a street in South Boston were alarmed by the cry of a lad outside, who shouted, "See that boy—oh! see that boy." A young lady hearing the cry, and missing a young child who had been playing in the room, ran into an adjoining chamber, and there found her younger brother hanging from the sill of the third story window. With great presence of mind she approached the window, and drew him into the room. He was almost exhausted, and could not have held out for a moment longer. The little fellow, although four years old, is unable to talk, and was hanging there in mute agony, without being able to call for help, or attract the attention of the family.

The New Bedford Mercury states that a letter received from Capt. Henry Brightman, dated at Manila, gives an acount of the massacre of Capt. Luce, together with five of the crew of ship Boy, of Warren, R. I., at one of the Caroline Islands. The Mercury expresses the hope that this outrage will receive the immediate attention of the Government, and that proper measures will be taken to chastise these savages.

On Tuesday the powder mill of Samuel M. Hobbs, in Barre, was blown up. There was but one individual in the mill at the time, an Irishman named Thomas Doyle, who was carried some eight rods, and shockingly mangled. There is no chance of saving his life. There were about 20 kegs of powder in the mill, besides what was in the cylinder. This is the fourth time this mill has been blown up, within a period of six years.

A dispatch to Milwaukee, dated May 30, says: "Yesterday morning a break occurred in the main dyke which connects Bloody Island with the Illinois shore, and in a few minutes about 60,000 yards of the embankment has been carried away, and is at last submerged from shore to shore. The road was nearly completed, and ready for use. The full extent of damage cannot be conveniently estimated until the whole subsides. It is thought the city will lose $12,000 or $15,000 by this accident."

Sims, the fugitive, is kept in the slave pen at Savannah, Georgia. The keeper of the pen says that he cannot sell Sims at any price. In consequence of his having been so long free, and in the north, no slave owner is willing to risk him among their negroes. Potter, his master, has had him severely whipped for betraying his confidence, has kept him in the slave pen ever since his return, and has determined that nothing but death shall release him from slavery.

Most of the Germans who were engaged in the Hoboken riots, confined in the jail at Bergen, are discharged, there being no evidence against them. Probably not more than six out of the fifty will be committed for trial. The evidence proves conclusively that the arrests were wantonly made by the rowdies, who exercised their own brutality under the pretence of preserving order.

At Worcester, on Friday, a little boy named Copp, 5 years of age, undertook in play to stop the shaft of a steam engine which was making 150 revolutions a minute. He seized hold of it, and was carried round for three minutes, 150 times, before his companions could give the alarm. The little fellow, though badly bruised, is likely to recover.

The crops in Washington County, N. Y., are fine and promising. The early planted corn, however, has been much injured by the worms, many fields having been entirely destroyed by these vermin. An attempt was made to rob the mail between Hamilton and Brantford, Canada West, on Thursday night. A hole large enough to admit a man's hand was cut in the bag. It is not known whether the robbers succeeded in abstarcting any thing, but fragments of a letter picked up in the road lead to the supposition that the Toronto mail was taken out.

We learn that the amount of Mexican claims not paid by the treasury is $800,000. The treasury have paid $330,000 of the returned duties on sugars. The Judge instructed the jury that a teacher had a right to punish to a reasonable extent for the violation of the rules; that he had the same right to punish that a parent had his own child; that neither teacher nor parent has the right to punish to an unreasonable extent. The jury acquitted the teacher.

The increase of inhabitants during the last ten years, is equal to 39 per cent.; of free inhabitants in the slave States is 30.3 per cent. There has been a decrease of free colored citizens in all the slave States south of Virginia, and the aggregate increase in all the States of this class of population is equal to only 8 per cent.

DIED.

At his residence near New Market, N. J., on the 23d ult., after a painful illness of two weeks, ASA DUNN, aged 71 years. Brother Dunn professed religion and became a member of the Piscataway Church in 1824; and, to the day of his death, filled his place with honor to himself, and with profit to the cause of God. His house was always a home for the stranger, and a resting place for the pilgrim; and many who visited him there will call to mind with pleasure his efforts to make their stay agreeable, and the happiness which he always appeared to enjoy in their company. Providence had blessed him with an ample fortune, the avails of which were largely devoted to the support of the church of which he was a member, and to the furtherance of the cause of God in the earth. It was only necessary for him to know that a projected enterprise was for the glory of God, and then his hand was not withheld from the work. From the first of his sickness he was conscious that his end was near, and his anxiety to "depart and be with Christ" was strong, and increasingly so, to the last. His conversation, his theme, by day and by night, was the excellence of the Christian religion, and the strength of his hope in Christ. He had no wish to recover, and any intimation of such an issue seemed to be rather painful than otherwise. He considered that he had lived out the period usually allotted to man, and that if he had ever done any good in the world, his usefulness was nearly at an end. To a sister in the church who visited him a few days before his departure, he said, "Sister, I am just entering Jordan, but I am satisfied I shall have a safe passage. I have a hope in Christ that will not fail me. My Saviour has been with me many years; he will not leave me now." Thus he continued in the perfect possession of his mental faculties till the closing of the sixth day, when, without a struggle or a groan, he yielded his spirit to GOD, and when his brethren whom he had left were commencing the observance of the Sabbath rest on earth, he had entered upon that eternal rest which remains for the people of God. In the death of brother Dunn, the church has lost one of her strong pillars, a faithful witness to the perpetuity of God's law, and a bright example of the sanctifying power of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Our loss, we doubt not, is his eternal gain. We will kiss the rod, and him that has appointed it. W. B. G.

At his residence in North Stonington, Ct., April 24, 1851, Mr. GREEN ALLEN, in the 72d year of his age. He was a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., and in his last, short sickness gave evidence of the power of grace in the soul. He died in full hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave.

In Lincklaen, N. Y., May 15th, Mrs. ADAH CAMPBELL, widow of the late Jabez Campbell, in the 76th year of her age. Sister Campell died in the triumphs of that faith which she had long professed. She has truly been a mother in Israel, having trained up a large family, three of whom became ministers of the gospel, and one the wife of a minister.

Columbus.

"Der Starke ist am machtigsten allein."—Schiller.

He stood upon the deck by night alone,
And heard the uproarious waste of ocean moan
Beneath the gusty darkness round him thrown.

The soughing winds amid his hair took way,
And damp his beard and brows with briny spray,
Yet steadfastly he watched the west alway;

Until at length he said: It is a light:
It must be, and on shore; so low, so bright,
So steady! God be praised!—ho! land in sight!

And soon throughout the crew, from man to man,
In startling shouts the rapt'rous tidings ran;
And wild for joy were they that light to scan.

No words can paint their triumph; yet I ween,
Had night not veiled his visage, they had seen
A bitter smile disturb his even mien.

The self same tongues, that but few hours ago,
Had counseled straight return, and sought to show
The folly of his scheme, their certain woe;

Vain upstarts, who had jeered, aye menaced him,
And faint hearts with desponding looks and dim—
All mixed their rash breath with his soul's deep hymn,

Exulting boastfully, that they had shared
Success, which ne'er had been had he not dared
Despise them, and hope on when they despaired.

Within themselves the Great must ever seek
Both impulse and reward; all else is weak
To what their own calm soul and conscience speak.

And thou—would'st thou Columbus-like aspire
To walk new worlds of thought, and high and higher
Exalt thy fallen soul on wings of fire—

On God and self do thou rely aright!
And through the day His cloud shall cheer thy sight,
And His fire-pillar guide thy steps by night.

The Timely Warning.

"Forsake not the law of thy Mother."—Prov. 1: 8.

Honor Thy Father and Thy Mother.

My father, after an absence of three years, returned to the home so dear to him. He had made his last voyage, and rejoiced to have reached a haven of rest from the perils of the sea. During his absence, I had grown from a mere infant into a rough careless boy. My mother's gentle voice no longer restrained me. I was often willful, and sometimes disobedient. I thought it indicated manly superiority to be independent of a woman's influence. My father's return was a fortunate circumstance for me. He soon perceived the spirit of insubortunation stirring within me. I saw by his manner that it displeased him, although for a few days he said nothing about it.

It was in an afternoon in October, bright and golden, that my father told me to get my hat, and take a walk with him. We turned down an open lane into a fine open field—a favorite play-ground for the children in the neighborhood. After talking cheerfully on different topics for a while, my father asked me if I observed a huge shadow, thrown on a mass of rocks that stood in the middle of the field? I replied that I did.

"My father owned this land," said he "It was my play-ground when a boy. That rock stood there then. To me it is a beacon, and whenever I look at it I recall a dark spot in my life—an event so painful to dwell upon, that if it were not as a warning to you, I should not speak of it. Listen, then, my dear boy, and learn wisdom from your father's errors.

My father died when I was a mere child. I was the only son. My mother was a gentle, loving woman, devoted to her children, and beloved by everybody. I remember her pale, beautiful face—her sweet, affectionate smile—her kind and tender voice. In my childhood I loved her intensely; I was never happy apart from her, and she, fearing that I was becoming too much of a baby, sent me to the High-School of the village. After associating a time with rude, rough boys, I lost, in a measure, my fondness for home and my reverence for my mother, and it became more and more difficult for her to restrain my impetuous nature. I thought it an indication of manliness to resist her authority, or to appear to feel impenitent, though I knew that my conduct pained her. The epithet I most dreaded was girl-boy. I could not bear to hear it said by my companions that I was tied to my mother's apron strings. From a quiet, home-loving child, I soon became a wild, roistering boy. My dear mother used every persuasion to influence me to seek happiness within the precincts of home, but I did not heed it.

It was on an afternoon like this, that as I was leaving the dining table, to spend the intermission between morning and evening school in the street, as usual, my mother laid her hand upon my shoulder, and said, mildly but firmly, 'My son, I wish you to come with me.' I would have rebelled, but something in her manner awed me.

She put on her bonnet, and said to me, 'We will take a little walk together.' I followed her in silence; and, as I was passing out of the door, I observed one of my rude companions skulking about the house, and I knew he was waiting for me. He sneered as I went past him. My pride was wounded to the quick. He was a very bad boy, but being some years older than myself he exercised a great influence over me. I followed my mother sulkily till we reached the spot where we now stand beneath the shadow of this huge rock. Oh, my boy! could that hour be blotted from my memory, which has cast a dark shadow over my whole life, gladly would I exchange all that the world can offer me, for the quiet peace of mind I should enjoy. But no! like this huge unsightly pile, stands the monument of my guilt forever.

My mother being feeble in health, set down, and beckoned me to sit beside her. Her look, so full of tender sorrow, is present with me now. I would not sit, but continued standing sullenly beside her.

'Alfred, my dear son,' said she, 'have you lost all love for your mother?' I did not reply. 'I fear you have,' she continued, 'and may God help you to see your own heart, and me to do my duty!' She then talked to me if my misdeeds, of the dreadful consequences of the course I was pursuing. By tears, and entreaties, and prayers, she tried to make an impression upon me. She placed before me the lives and example of great and good men; and sought to stimulate my ambition. I was moved, but too proud to show it, and remained standing in dogged silence beside her. I thought, 'what will my companions say, if after all my boasting, I yield at last, and submit to be led by a woman?'

What agony was visible on my mother's face, when she saw that all she said and suffered failed to move me! She rose to go home, and I followed at a distance. She spoke no more to me till she reached her own door.

'It is school time now,' said she. 'Go, my son, and once more let me beseech you to think upon what I have said.'

'I shan't go to school,' said I.

She looked astonished at my boldness, but replied firmly,

'Certainly you will go Alfred. I command you.'

'I will not!' said I, with a tone of defiance.

'One of two things you must do, Alfred—either go to school this momen. or I will lock you in your room and keep you there till you are ready to promise implicit obedience to my wishes in future.'

'I dare you to do it,' said I, 'you can't get me up stairs.'

'Alfred, choose now,' said my mother who laid her hand upon my arm. She trembled violently, and was deadly pale.

'If you touch me, I will kick you,' said I, in a terrible rage. God knows I knew not what I said.

'Will you go, Alfred?'

'No!' I replied, but quailed beneath her eye.

'Then follow me,' said she, as she grasped my arm firmly. I raised my foot—oh, my son, hear me!—I raised my foot and kicked her—my sainted mother! How my head reels, as the torment of memory rushes over me! I kicked my mother—a feeble woman—my mother! She staggered back a few steps, and leaned against the wall. She did not look at me. I saw her heart beat against her breast. 'O, Heavenly Father,' she cried 'forgive him—he knows not what he does!' The gardener just then passed the door, and seeing my mother pale and almost unable to support herself, he stopped; she beckoned him in. 'Take this boy up stairs and lock him in his own room,' said she and turned from me. Looking back as she was entering her room, she gave me such a look, it will forever follow me—it was a look of agony, mingled with the intensest love—it was the last unutterable pang from a heart that was broken.

In a moment I found myself a prisoner in my own room. I thought, for a moment, I would fling myself from the window, and dash my brains out, but I felt afraid to die. I was not penitent. At times my heart was subdued, but my stubborn pride rose in an instant, and bade me not to yield. The pale face of my mother haunted me. I flung myself on the bed and fell asleep. I awoke at midnight stiffened, by the damp night air, terrified with frightful dreams. I would have sought my mother at that moment, for I trembled with fear, but my door was fast. With the daylight my terrors were dissipated, and I became bold in resisting all good impulses. The servant brought my meals, but I did not taste them. I thought the day would never end. Just at twilight I heard a light footstep approach the door. It was my sister, who called me by name.

'What may I tell mother from you?' she asked.

'Nothing,' I replied.

'Oh, Alfred! for my sake, for all our sakes, say that you are sorry—let me tell mother that you are sorry. She longs to forgive you.'

'I won't be driven to school against my will,' said I.

'But you will go if she wishes it, dear Alfred,' said my sister, pleadingly.

'No, I won't,' said I, 'and you needn't say a word more about it.'

'Oh, brother! you will kill her! you will kill her, and then you can never have a happy moment again.'

I made no reply to this. My feelings were touched but I still resisted their kind influence. My sister called me but I would not answer. I heard her footsteps slowly retreating, and again I flung myself on the bed to pass another wretched and fearful night. Oh, God! how wretched! how fearful I did not know.

Another footstep, slower and feebler than my sister's, disturbed me. A voice called me by name. It was my mother's.

'Alfred, my son, shall I come in? Are you sorry for what you have done?' she asked.

I cannot tell what influence, operating at that moment, made me speak adverse to my feelings. The gentle voice of my mother thrilled through me, melted the ice from my obdurate heart, and I longed to throw myself on her neck, but I did not. No, my boy, I did not. But my words gave the lie to my heart, when I said I was not sorry. I heard her withdraw. I heard her groan. I longed to call her back, but I did not.

I was awakened from an uneasy slumber, by hearing my name called loudly, and my sister stood by my bedside,

'Get up Alfred. Oh, don't wait a minute! Get up and come with me. Mother is dying.'

I thought I was yet dreaming, but I got up melancholy, and followed my sister. On the bed pale and cold as marble lay my mother. She had not undressed. She had thrown herself on the bed to rest; arising to go again to me, she was seized with a palpitation of the heart, and borne senseless to her room.

I cannot tell you my agony as I looked upon her—my remorse was tenfold more bitter from the thought that she would never know it. I believed myself her murderer. I fell on the bed beside her. I could not weep. My heart burned in my bosom; my brain was all on fire. My sister threw her arms around me and wept in silence. Suddenly we saw a slight motion of mother's hand—her eyes unclosed. She had recovered her consciousness, but not speech. She looked at me, and moved her lips. I could not understand her words. 'Mother, mother,' I shrieked, 'say only that you forgive me.' She could not say it with her lips, but her hands pressed mine. She smiled upon me, and lifting her thin, white hands, she clasped my own within them, and cast her eyes upward. She moved her lips in prayer, and thus she died. I remained still kneeling beside that dear form, till my gentle sister removed me. She comforted me, for she knew the heavy load of sorrow at my heart; heavier than grief for the loss of my mother; for it was a load of sorrow for sin. The joy of youth had left me forever.

My son, the sufferings such memories awake, must continue as long as life. God is merciful; but remorse for past misdeeds is a canker-worm in the heart, that preys upon it forever."

My father ceased speaking, and buried his face in his hands. He saw and felt the bearing his narrative had upon my character and conduct. I have never forgotten it. Boys who spurn a mother's control, who are ashamed to own that they are wrong, who think it manly to resist her authority, or yield to her influence, beware! Lay not up for yovrselves bitter memories for your future years. Preparation of Hams.

Few articles of animal food depend more for their acceptability upon the perfection of the process of curing than smoked hams, and few are better relished at all tables than these, when well prepared and preserved. We propose, therefore, to give a summary of the most important requisites necessary to their being of excellent quality.

Something depends, it is true, upon the feeding and size of the hog as well as upon the salting and smoking. The best hams are furnished by hogs weighing not over 200 lbs., which have been fed mostly on solid food—such as corn, peas, and barley—and have been allowed range and room for exercise, so that the lean or muscular part is well and healthily developed. To these causes combined, the Westphalia and Virginia hams owe probably a portion of their excellence. Hams from hogs weighing from 300 to 400 lbs. and over, are so large that it is almost impossible either to salt or smoke them thoroughly, without taking longer time and more pains than is usually allowed or considered necessary.

There are a multitude of recipes for pickling hams, each possessing in the minds of those who use them their peculiar excellencies, and we will give here two or three of the most noted, so that our readers may choose that which they deem most proper, or feasible of application. They have all been published before.

The celebrated "Knickerbocker Pickle," which is recommended as superior for both beef and pork, is compounded as follows: Take 6 gallons of water, 9 lbs. of good salt, 3 lbs. coarse brown sugar, 1 quart molasses, 3 ounces saltpetre, and 1 ounce of perlash; mix and boil the whole well, and skim off all impurities. The meat should be slightly rubbed with fine salt, and lie a day or two, that the blood may drain off; and should then be packed in tight casks, and the pickle turned on cold, in which it should remain until sufficiently cured for smoking.

The Virginia method, or dry mode of curing, is as follows: For each ham take a spoonful of saltpetre, pulverize and apply it; rub each piece with salt well on both sides, and pack them in hogsheads with holes in the bottom to let off the brine. Let them remain five or six weeks; then take them out, brush off the salt, rub each well with hickory ashes, and hang each piece in the smoke house.

What is called the Jersey method, is as follows: To every 80 lbs. of ham, take 4 ounces of sugar, 3 ounces of saltpetre, and 1 pint of fine salt. Powder and mix them finely, and rub the hams well with this mixture, and lay them on planks for two days. Then pack in casks, adding 2 quarts of salt to every 80 lbs. of ham. In fifteen days they may be taken to the smoke house.

The excellence of a ham depends much upon the smoking or drying, and, indeed, the best are made when both smoking and drying are performed at the same time. It is a matter that cannot be hurried, and six weeks is the least time in which a ham can be perfectly and thoroughly cured. The meat must not be kept in a damp, unventilated smoke house so that the surface will be in the least moist or dripping, if good hams are expected. They should also be hung at such a distance from the fire that the heat will not affect them.

Hickory and maple are the best woods for making the smoke, and the cobs of dry, sound Indian corn are first rate for that purpose. A fire built once or twice a day answers in the end, better than one kept up continually, as the smoking and drying are thus most perfectly performed.

Phosphate of Lime in New Jersey.

Among the other almost infinite variety of valuable mineral deposits in this State, we believe we have before alluded to the discovery of the phosphate of lime, which has been found in large quantities on the property of the New Jersey Exploring and Mining Company, at Hurdstown, near the head of Lake Hopatcong, in Sussex County. It has just been analyzed by Dr. Jackson of Boston, and other scientific men, and found to contain over 90 per cent. of the pure phosphate, which is exceedingly valuable for agricultural purposes, in enriching land, &c. We learn from the Boston Atlas that the subject was mentioned at a recent meeting of their Natural History Society, when its properties as a valuable manure were discussed. The Atlas says: "Since the announcement of the discovery of this mineral was made, Dr. Jackson has demonstrated its value for other purposes, even more important. By a simple, easy, and cheap process, he has discovered the means of separating the lime and other ingredients from the phosphoric acid, and has thus extracted both this substance, as well as phosphorus from the rock. This is the first time, we believe, that phosphorus has ever been obtained from mineral substances. Formerly this article could only be procured by a slow, tedious, expensive and disgusting process from animal substances. The discovery of making it from bones was an important one, facilitating its manufacture, and rendering the article much cheaper. The discovery led to others, among which was its use and value in printing and dying calicoes, &c, to which it is now extensively applied, and manufactured for that purpose. The discovery that it can be made with less expense, and in much greater quantities, from a mineral found in abundance, in at least two accessible localities, will probably lead to another great changed in the mode of its manufacture, and lessen the cost of the article. In this way both the farmer and the manufacturer may derive important benefits from the discovery of this valuable mineral, and the gentleman to whose scientific knowledge both its discovery and its important applications are due, may again be regarded as a great public benefactor. The mineral from Hurdstown contains $92\frac{4}{10}$ per cent. of pure phosphate of lime, and yields 46½ per cent. of phosphoric acid, and 20 per cent. of phosphorus. Beside its use in dying, and the manufacture of matches, phosphorus is also esteemed of value in medicine. [Adv.

The Heroic Divinity Student.

The following passage we find in the life of Dr. Chalmers, by his son-in-law, Doctor Hanna. This admirable young student saved seven lives by the sacrifice of his own. The fact has not an equal in the history of philanthropic bravery. The efforts of the dreadful day brought on the student a malady which in the following October proved fatal, and Dr. Chalmers preached one of his most eloquent sermons at the funeral of the Christian hero. The scene was on the northern coast of Scotland.

One fearful winter day the intelligence circulated through St. Andrews that a vessel had been driven upon a sandbank in the bay, to the eastward of the town. A crowd of sailors, citizens, and students, soon collected upon the beach; for the vessel had been cast ashore but a few hundred yards from the house, and she lay so near, that, though the heavy air was darkend by the driving sleet, they could see at intervals the figures of the crew clinging to rope or spar ere each breaker burst upon her side, and shrouded all in surfy mist and darkness. In a calm sea a few vigorous strokes would have carried a good swimmer to the vessel's side; but now the hardiest fisherman drew back, and dared not face the fearful surge. At last a student of divinity volunteered. Tying a rope round his waist, and struggling through the surf, he threw himself among the waves. Forcing his slow way through the raging element, he was nearing the vessel's side, when his friends on shore, alarmed at the length of time and slow rate of recent progress, began to pull him back. Seizing a knife, which he carried between his teeth, he cut the rope away, and reaching at last the stranded sloop, drew a fresh one from her to the shore; but hungry, weak, and wearied, after four days' fondless tossing through the tempest, not one of the crew had strength or courage left to use it. He again rushed into the waves; he boarded the vessel, he took them man by man, and bore them to the land Six men were rescued thus. His seventh. charge was a boy, so helpless that twice was the hold let go, and twice he had to dive after him into the deep. Meanwhile, in breathless stillness the crowd had watched each perilous passage, still the double figure was tossing landward through the spray. But when the deed was done, and the whole crew saved, a loud cheer of admiriing triumph rose around the gallant youth.

An African Review.

The King took his seat under a canopy of umbrellas, and placed us on his right; about the royal person were the ministers and high military officers; at the foot of the throne sat the too-noo-noo; and now in the distance, ready at call, appeared the mae-ha-pah, a soldier too. As soon as the King was seated, the troops, male and female, marched past in quick time; 77 banners and 160 huge umbrellas enlivening the scene; while 55 discordant bands, and the shouts of soldiers as they hailed their King en passant, almost deafened the observers. The royal male regiment, separating from the main body, headed by an emblem of a leopard on a staff, skirmished towards the royal canopy, keeping up a constant independent fire. In advance was a band of blunderbuss men in long green grass cloaks, for bush service. Halting in front, they held aloft their muskets with one hand, while with the other they rattled a small metal ball, which each soldier carried, and yelled and shouted. Some having light ornamental pieces flung them in the air, to catch them again. This is the Dahoman salute; and in answer to it, his majesty left his war-stool, and placing himself at their head, danced a war-dance. First, he received a musket and fired it; then danced, advanced, and retired; he then crept cautiously forward, and standing on tiptoe, reconnoitered; this he did several times, dancing a retreat; at last, making certain the position of the enemy, he received and fired a musket; and this was the signal for all, with a great war-cry, to rush on and re-commence firing. On their recall, having again saluted, the King returned to his tent, and told us he had been to war. After much firing the amazons took position to the left, and having formed a canopy in the center for their officers, who sat on stools, squatted on their hams. In this undignified but usual position, with their long Danish muskets standing up like a forest, they remained observers of the remainder of the operation. This now became a sort of military levee, at which each chief prostrated before the King, introduced his officers, and reported the number of his retainers. Having taking ground at the further end of the field, one at a time, the squadrons enfiladed between two fetish houses and commenced an open fire, and deploying into line, passed to the right of the royal stool, while the officers came up at double quick time, prostrated themselves, danced, fired muskets, and then received each, as a mark of favor, a bottle of rum. After the cabooceers had thus passed, the ministers performed the same ceremony, among them was Senor Ignatio Da Souza, the slave dealer and cabooceer, at the head of his brother the chacha's levies. As they danced down towards the royal seat the King left his throne and went out and danced with him. A regiment advanced, guarding the idols of the military fetishes; the King again left his stool, and poured some rum on black puddings of human blood, which were carried by the fetish priests. At seven the last body had passed, that of the mayo's company of 300 men, ended the review. Order and discipline were observable throughout, uniform and good accoutrements general; and, except in the most civilzied countries in the world, and even there as regarded the order of the multitude, no review had gone off better. There was no delay, no awkwardness, no accident—aids-de-camp rushing about with orders; it was noble and extremely interesting. Every facility was offered us toward acquiring information, and, except an exaggeration in numbers, truly given. The King has great pride in his army, and often turned to us with an inquiring eye as the amazons went through their evolutions; he is justly proud of these female guards, who appear in every way to rival the male.

Tea.—All the world have heard of the disappointment of Sir Walter Raleigh's gardener when he tasted the apples of the potato, which he supposed must be the precious part of the plant. The original tasters of tea had no better luck. Southey says—

"Miss Hutchinson's great-grandmother was one of a party who partook of the first pound of tea that ever came into Penrith It was sent as a present, and without directions how to use it. They boiled the whole at once in a kettle, and sat down to eat the leaves with butter and salt. They wondered how any person could like such a dish."

An Accommodating Judge.

We find the following anecdote in Governor Ford's History of Illinois:

In those days, (from 1818 to 1830,) justice was administered in the Courts without much show, parade or ceremony. The Judges were gentlemen of sense and learning, who held their Courts mostly in log houses, or the bar rooms of taverns fitted up for that purpose, with a temporary bench for Judges and chairs and benches for the lawyers and jurors. At the first Circuit Court in Washington county, by Judge John Reynolds, on the opening of the Court the Sheriff went out into the Court yard and said to the people, "Boys, come in, our John is going to hold Court." This was the proclamation for opening the Court.

In general, the Judges were averse to deciding questions of law. They did not like the responsibility of offending one or the other parties. They preferred to submit every thing they could to be decided by the jury. I knew one who, when asked for instructions to the jury on points of law, would rub his head and the sides of his face with his hands, and say to the lawyers, "Why, gentlemen, the jury understands it; they need no instruction; no doubt they will do justice." This same Judge presided at a Court in which a man named Green, was convicted for murder, and it became his unpleasant duty to pronounce sentence upon the culprit. He called the prisoner before him and said to him, "Mr. Green, the jury say you are guilty of murder, and the law says that you are to be hung. I want you and your friends down on Indian Creek to know that it is not I who condemn you, it is the jury and the law. Mr. G., what time would you like to be hung? The law allows you time for preparation."

Mr. Green then said, "May it please your honor, I am ready at any time, those who kill the body have no power over the soul. My preparation is made and I am ready at any time the Court pleases."

The Judge replied, "Mr. Green, it is a very serious matter to be hung; It can't happen to a man but once in his life, and you had better take all the time you can get. Mr. Clerk, look at the Almanac, and see wether this day four weeks comes on Sunday." The Clerk looked as directed, and reported that that day four weeks was Thursday. Then said the Judge, "Mr. Green, the Court will give you only to this day four weeks." The case was prosecuted by James Turney, the Attorney General, who interposed and said, "May it please the Court, on occasions of this sort it is usual for Courts to pronounce a formal sentence; to remind the prisoner of his perilous condition; to reprove him for his guilt, and to warn him against the judgment in the world to come." To which the Judge replied, "O, Mr. Turney, Mr. Green understands the whole matter; he knows he has got to be hung; you understand it, Mr. Green, don't you?" "Yes," said the prisoner. "Then, Mr. Sheriff, let the prisoner be remanded and adjourn Court."

A Leper.

The following account of a leper, from the pen of Mr. Caunter, a late traveler in the east, will afford our readers a pretty correct notion of the appearance of the sufferers by that strange disease: "One evening, while strolling along the sea-shore, I saw such an extraordinary object before me, that I could not take my eyes off it. It was a man, whose clothing, like that of all the lower orders of India, was a piece of cloth, wrapped around the body, from the waist downward. His skin was perfectly white, and it seemed glazed, as if seared with a hot iron. His head was uncovered, and his hair, which was precisely the same color as the skin, hung down in long strips upon his lean and withered shoulders. His eyes, with the exception of the balls, were a dull, murky red, and he kept them fixed on the ground, as if it were painful to him to look up, which I found to be the case. He walked slowly and feebly, and he was so frightfully thin that he stood before me a living skeleton. I moved towards him, but he walked farther from me, beseeching me to give the smallest trifle to a miserable man—an outcast from his home and friends. He told me not to come near to a polluted creature, for whom no one felt pity. He told me he had, during many years, suffered dreadfully from the leprosy, and though he was now cured, the corps-like whiteness of his skin gave unmistakable evidence that he had once been a leper."

New Method of Teaching Music.

A Highland piper having a scholar to teach, disdained to crack his brain with the names of semibreves, minims, crotchets, or quavers. "Here, Donald," said he, "take your pipes, lad, and gie's a blast. So, vera well blawn, indeed, but what's a sound, Donald, without sense. Ye may blaw forever without making a tune on't if I dinna tell you how the queer things on the paper maun help ye. Ye see that big fellow, wi' a round open face, (pointing to a semibreve between the two lines of a bar,) he moves slowly from that line to this, while ye beat ane wi' your fit, and gie a lang blast; if now ye put a leg to him, ye mak twa' him, and he'll move twice as fast; and if ye black his face, he'll run four times faster than the fellow wi' the white face; but if, after blacking his face, ye'll bend his knee, or tie his knee, or tie his legs, he'll hop ten times faster than the white faced chap that I showed you first. Now whenever you blow your pipes, Donald, remember this; that the tighter those fellows legs are tied, the faster they'll run, and the quicker they're sure to dance."

A young lady lately appeared in male attire at St. Louis, and one of the editors says that her disguise was so perfect she might have passed for a man, had she had a little more modesty!

As a general thing, the less a man reads the more loquacious he is. Put a dozen ignoramuses in a room, and they will wrangle all night about the "constitutionality of a saw-mill."

Why is a lady's hair like the latest news? Because in the morning we always find it in papers.
